Sharon warns government will fall

By JAY BUSHINSKY

If the cabinet recommends withdrawing the IDF from 13 percent of the West Bank in a second redeployment and an additional one percent in the third, "this government will fall," National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon warned yesterday.

According to an associate, Sharon took this stand during a turbulent three-hour session of the inner cabinet, attended by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky.

He predicted that the coalition will be brought down by a Knesset vote of no confidence — not on the withdrawal issue, since it can expect support from the Labor Party on that score — "but on any other issue that may come up."

The tension reportedly occurred after Mordechai declared that he intends to raise any subject he wishes during future talks with Palestinian representatives.

Netanyahu cut in, saying Mordechai is only authorized to discuss the nature of the newly-designated Area D, which is to be handed over to Palestinian administrative control.

According to plans, the IDF, after withdrawing from Area D, would retain the right to re-enter it for security reasons. The Palestinians would also be barred from building in the area, currently comprised of empty land.

Sharon cautioned his colleagues against making any new decisions about the projected troop redeployment during his absence. He is scheduled to leave today on a 12-day trip to China and Mongolia.

"If you decide on anything while I'm away my position should be known to you in advance," he said. "I oppose any pullback that exceeds nine percent."

When Sharon described the agreements reached between Netanyahu and U.S. officials as "too foggy," Netanyahu tried to modify him by explaining that the Americans do not want the Palestinians to lose face.

But this did not change Sharon's opinion, according to the associate.

"Here we are dealing with the problem of how to avoid an insult," Sharon reportedly said.

PA might give Israel two or three meetings

By STEVE RODAN
and news agencies

The Palestinian Authority is considering a US suggestion to hold one week of direct talks with Israel, but Chairman Yasser Arafat will not participate, PA officials said yesterday.

Instead, the talks will be headed by Mahmoud Abbas, secretary of the PLO Executive Committee, and Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

Officials said a date and location of the talks will be decided after Arafat returns from China today.

Asked in Beijing if he would resume talks with Israel, Arafat told reporters: "We are not against opening talks, but we are in need of results and not talks."

"It is clear and obvious [Israel is] trying to escape from implementing accurately and honestly what has been signed between both of us," Arafat said. "I am not asking for the moon."

Arafat declined to comment on any possible negotiations, saying: "I have no direct invitation to continue the peace process."

The head of the PA negotiating team, Saeb Erekat, said the US proposal for direct talks was raised by US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright during her meeting last week with Erekat and PA International Cooperation Minister Nabil Shaath.

"She said, 'The Israelis have something to say to you,'" Erekat said.

Erekat, who stressed that Arafat has not yet consented, said the US plan is to conduct one week of talks, which will include two or three meetings. After the meetings, he said, the Clinton administration will decide whether to release its bridging proposal for the implementation of the interim accord.

Erekat placed little hope that direct talks with the Israelis would produce an agreement. He said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has no intention of continuing the Oslo process and is simply submitting new proposals to gain time.

Manbar sentencing today

Nahum Manbar sits in Tel Aviv District Court during the hearing on his sentencing yesterday. The court is due to hand down its sentence today if the Supreme Court rejects an appeal by attorney Amnon Zichroni against Judge Amnon Strashnov's refusal to disqualify himself.

Zichroni appeals against Strashnov's refusal to disqualify himself

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN

Tel Aviv District Court Judge Amnon Strashnov yesterday rejected the defense motion that he withdraw from the high-profile Manbar treason case, stating he would pass sentence on Nahum Manbar today.

"A successful career is built with much toil, diligence and sweat. Destroying it is possible with a blow of one hand and the breath of slander, a lie and deceiving words," Strashnov told the packed courtroom, after dismissing defense attorney Amnon Zichroni's request that he disqualify himself.

"A man's reputation, especially a judge's, is the most valuable asset he owns. I have preserved this asset and will always do so to baseless, essentially a gossip item and not made in good faith. He said he is prepared to be questioned at any time if there is an investigation into the affair.

Commenting on Strashnov's statement, Zichroni said all his moves were for his client's good and made out of professional consideration.

"I'm a lawyer, my job is to convey a client's message. When you get certain material, you cannot ignore it. The only consideration is how to best serve your client."

"Sometimes the results are not good. But we don't act according to the results, but according to reality," he said.

Manbar, who was convicted of treason last month, yesterday asked the court's forgiveness and expressed remorse for making "an inadvertent mistake."

The prosecution is asking the court for a life sentence.

"I erred. I thought it was permitted to trade with Iran. It was a mistake. I went about my business like in other things, close to the heart, but I love Israel with all my heart, and if the judges think I've harmed the state, I ask for forgiveness," Manbar said.

He said he had entangled himself in other business affairs, due to his tendency to "walk on the edge" and had needed therapy for it.

Manbar pleaded that the court not "ruin my children's life because of a mistake I didn't intend to make."

In the hearing on Manbar's sentence, Strashnov said Netanyahu's calling for a harsh sentence to be imposed on Manbar after he was convicted was "unworthy."

Zichroni had sharply criticized Netanyahu at the time, calling his utterance "a vulgar interference" in the judicial process.

Prosecutor Dvora Chen explained that Manbar had not been arrested during the term of the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin because there was not enough evidence against him at the time.

After the prosecution had made up its mind to press charges against Manbar, it needed Netanyahu's permission to reveal sensitive material. This was the reason for Netanyahu's involvement in the proceedings, she said.

Chen said Manbar's crime was perhaps the worst in Israel's criminal history and demanded the maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

Manbar was convicted of aiding an enemy state, having supplied Iran with material for mustard and nerve gas and equipment to build munitions plants for chemical warheads.

Manbar's defense team asked for a maximum seven-year jail sentence, ideally to include time served since his arrest last year.

the end of my days. No lawyer will trample on my reputation," he said, referring to the allegations of improper conduct on his part during the trial.

Zichroni late last night appealed Strashnov's decision to the Supreme Court.

The court is to convene at 8 this morning to decide whether to order a delay in Manbar's sentencing until it can consider Zichroni's appeal.

Strashnov said in his decision that the defense's arguments to disqualify him are untruthful and illogical.

He denied meeting Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu or having any contact with him or receiving anything from him during the trial, noting the last time the two met was on February 25, 1997, at a session of the Knesset Law Committee.

Strashnov denied seeing attorney Pinhas Yanai outside the district courthouse and said his relations with her were correct, as the relations between a judge and his intern should be.

"I don't intend to comment on the murky relations between the defense attorneys Yanai and Zichroni or all the other relationships Yanai had or didn't have," Strashnov said.

He said Zichroni's request to disqualify him should be rejected, if only because it was not made at the time the defense received the information it was basing the request on.

"It's hard for me to shake the impression that the disqualification request only came up after the conviction, to prevent me from ending the trial," he said.

Strashnov said the request was An unclear decision

BY JEFF COOPER

Judge Amnon Strashnov's decision to reject attorney Amnon Zichroni's motion to disqualify him reads more like a personal response than a dry court decision.

Strashnov listed Zichroni's allegations, denying any wrongdoing in each case. From the various allegations, Strashnov confirmed having only one conversation with attorney Pinhas Yanai — regarding her ongoing dispute with Zichroni.

Strashnov categorically denied Zichroni's main points: He denied receiving material relating to the trial from Yanai, denied having met her outside the court building, denied having a relationship with her beyond the ordinary judge-apprentice relationship, and denied receiving any messages from the Prime Minister's Office regarding the trial.

If this is the truth, Strashnov could not decide to disqualify himself, nor should he have done so.

In making the denials so absolute, however, he is exposing himself should any reliable evidence surface to the contrary; it is therefore highly likely such evidence does not exist.

Strashnov's first decision reads like the denial of an innocent man.

Strashnov's second decision yesterday, though, is less understandable.

After he refused to disqualify himself and Zichroni announced he would appeal the decision, Strashnov should have, according to the Procedure Act of 1982, stopped the trial until the Supreme Court's final ruling.

The judge is permitted to proceed under these circumstances only if there is a "special reason" for doing so, and it does not appear that Strashnov had any such special reason.

The logic behind the requirement to stop the trial is simple. The damage which could occur if the trial proceeds with a judge who is eventually disqualified may be significant. The damage from a short-term delay, however, is minimal.

Since the defendant, Nahum Manbar, is the one requesting the delay and he is in jail anyway, there would be no apparent damage done by postponing the sentencing until a final decision is rendered on the move to disqualify the judge.

From a legal perspective, therefore, it is unclear why Strashnov decided to proceed.

June CPI up 0.4%

By DAVID HARRIS

The consumer price index (CPI) rose a higher-than-expected 0.4 percent in June to 156.5, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced yesterday.

The rise in the CPI totaled 2.2 percent in the first half of the year, after ending the first quarter with no rise.

Housing prices have increased by 2.2% this year. Bureau economists said they expect inflation to end the year at 4% or slightly higher.

Neeman: This is not an increase in taxes

By DAVID HARRIS

From September 1, all residents will face a monthly fee for medical services plus additional charges for visits to doctors and hospital outpatient departments.

The Knesset Finance Committee yesterday narrowly approved the Treasury proposals, which are aimed at offsetting the funds' combined deficit, estimated to be NIS 1.4-1.6 billion.

The fees levied from the public are expected to rise NIS 350 million a year, with the Treasury adding NIS 450m, and the remainder coming from in-house efficiency measures, according to the plan.

Committee members voted 8-7 in favor of the plan, but in the wake of Shas abstaining, a revote will be held on Monday. However, committee Chairman Avraham Ravitz (United Torah Judaism) said the result is likely to remain unchanged.

Despite Ravitz's confidence, MK Yitzhak Cohen (Shas) said his party is still opposed to the fixed monthly payments.

During the various meetings in the Knesset over the last two days, Finance Minister Yaakov Neeman and coalition whip Meir Shechrit (Likud) have been stressing the importance of this issue, even going as far as to suggest it is a vote of confidence in the government.

This left Shas in a difficult position, not wanting to vote against the government, but at the same time not wanting to support the reform.

Following the meeting, Neeman expressed his pleasure with the outcome, saying the decision was a major step towards reducing health fund debts.

"The health funds are in a bad situation and their financial difficulties must be dealt with," Neeman said. "This is not tax but a payment for services."

However, MKs from various

parties accused the government of breaking its promise not to hike taxes.

"The government says if you pay for a service you aren't paying tax, but this is taxation from all points of view," said Labor's chief economics spokesman Avraham Shohat, who called on the public not to pay the new fees.

Labor is now seeking legal advice as to whether the new regulations will be in breach of the National Health Insurance Law.

"They [the government] don't like to use the word tax, but I say it is a tax," Ravitz said. "But it is a specific tax, unlike usual taxes, which go into a general pot, this will be spent on one particular thing — medical services."

While Health Minister Yehoshua Matza welcomed the decision, he said he is still far from happy.

"I will be happy when I see that it's possible to balance health funds' budgets, which isn't going to be easy," he said.

Proposed changes in health-care payments

Originally proposed in April, the Treasury's measures are:

- Every fund member would pay a monthly sum, to be determined by the funds, of a maximum of NIS 55 per household.

- Families would pay up to a quarterly maximum of NIS 160 for visiting specialists and outpatient departments.

- An NIS 20 payment to cover three months of visits to general practitioners other than one's own regular doctor.

- The price of prescription drugs would rise 30 percent.

- The poor would be exempt from various payments.

- The payments would differ marginally according to each health fund.

Shoval takes over as ambassador in US

For the second time in the 1990s, Zalman Shoval yesterday assumed command of the Israeli embassy from Eliahu Ben-Elissar.

The carefully choreographed changing of the guard occurred just hours after Ben-Elissar departed to begin a short American vacation. Ben-Elissar will assume the ambassadorship in Paris in September.

Shoval addressed the embassy's staff soon after arriving, saying that "Israel stands before fateful decisions regarding its future, and the embassy in the US is on the front-line of Israel's foreign policy."

Shoval served as ambassador earlier in the decade until the 1992 election drove Likud from power.

Australian parliamentary report slams Israel

Israel's approach to the Middle East peace process was denounced yesterday as short-sighted and a tragedy in a strongly worded Australian parliamentary report just four weeks before a visit there by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The report was made by a parliamentary delegation to Syria, Lebanon, Jordan and Israel, led by Speaker Ian Sinclair.

"The delegation concluded that the current position adopted by the Israeli government on the peace process is very short-sighted," the report said.

The report also attacked Israel's handling of the Maccabiah bridge collapse, which killed four Australian athletes last summer.

UN backs protest to Israel over Lebanon incident

UN Security Council members expressed serious concern yesterday over the wounding of an Irish UN peacekeeper and a civilian in south Lebanon and supported a strong protest lodged with Israel, council president Sergei Lavrov of Russia said. In a statement to reporters after council consultations on a number of issues, he said the injuries occurred when two mortar rounds exploded Monday near a position of the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL).

"The members of the council authorized me to express their serious concern at that incident and over the safety of UN personnel in Lebanon. They also fully supported the strong protest which UNIFIL made to the Israeli authorities regarding that incident," he said.

District court apprenticeships don't come easily

By GIL HOFFMAN

To get an apprenticeship with a district court judge like Amnon Strashnov, Pinat Yanai would have to have earned high grades in law school, be very persistent, or have good connections. Ricki Olmert, head of administration of the Bar-Ilan University Faculty of Law said yesterday.

Competition is fierce for prospective lawyers, who normally do a one-year internship after completing seven semesters of law school. Some 1,200 new lawyers — a record — were admitted to the Israel Bar Association this past May.

Most law students begin looking for an apprenticeship in their second year of law school, Olmert said. According to Olmert, the best students usually try to get posts at the Supreme Court, but ultimately students choose a place that best suits their interests.

While Bar-Ilan and the Hebrew University do not help place their students, other law schools have placement offices. The law college where Yanai studied, which has since closed, was affiliated with Bar-Ilan.

Hillel Sommer, a lecturer at the Radzyner Law School Interdisciplinary Center of Herzliya, said apprentices usually write memoranda and drafts of decisions, but each judge decides how much responsibility he or she wants to delegate.

Sommer said judges often work alone with apprentices, which, he said, "creates an atmosphere where everything is possible."

Zichroni asks Strashnov to leave trial

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's spokesman, Shai Bazak, allegedly told Pinat Yanai, one of Nahum Manbar's defense attorneys, that the government had an interest in exposing the Manbar affair to show that prime minister Yitzhak Rabin had kept it in the dark, due to Manbar's relations with the Labor Party.

This was one of the details revealed by Attorney Amnon Zichroni, who asked Tel Aviv District Judge Amnon Strashnov to withdraw from presiding at the Manbar treason trial.

Zichroni's request is based on the alleged close relations between Pinat Yanai, who served as part of the defense team with Zichroni for a time, and Strashnov. Zichroni also alleged there were contacts between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office and Strashnov.

Bazak told Yanai half a year ago that Manbar would be convicted, Zichroni told the court. Bazak also told Yanai, with whom he is friendly, of the close relations between the Prime Minister's Office and Strashnov's office.

Parts of Zichroni's request derive from the statement submitted by Yanai's former boyfriend, Ziv Chen, to whom she had given details about the case, and long-distance telephone conversations between Yanai and Manbar's wife Francine, who tape-recorded the calls. These conversations included alleged details of Yanai's relationship with Strashnov and of her talks with him about the Manbar case.

Zichroni said Yanai told Francine Manbar she had talked to Strashnov after the conviction and hinted to him about a conspiracy. According to Francine Manbar, Yanai told her after the conviction that Netanyahu called Strashnov's Amnon Zichroni in Tel Aviv District Court yesterday.

(Yael Sorek/Israel Sun)

office a number of times, and that she had learned this from Bazak.

Zichroni also said he has a statement by Francine Manbar saying Zichroni called Yanai and asked her to meet her in a Jerusalem hotel 10 days before he gave Manbar's verdict. Immediately after that meeting, Yanai called Francine Manbar and told her she had spoken to the judge about the trial.

The recorded conversations also include details of a trip Yanai took to China, together with a witness for the prosecution, to bring back a witness for the defense, behind the back of Zichroni, who had asked her not to go. Yanai gave the material she got from the witness in China directly to Strashnov, although she knew this was forbidden. This was after Zichroni had fired Yanai, though she continued working for Manbar independently at Manbar's request.

"How are we to blame if she deceived you?" interjected Strashnov at this point. According to Chen's statement, after Manbar's conviction Strashnov called Yanai and asked her to join him at New York University, where he was going to spend a six-month sabbatical. At this point the judges started joking, and told Zichroni he was lowering the debate to a ridiculous level.

Zichroni told the judges that

Zvilli backtracks from implicating Netanyahu

By LIAT COLLINS

MK Nissim Zvilli (Labor), the first person to publicly break the Strashnov Affair, yesterday backtracked on his implication that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had been involved in trying to influence Tel Aviv District Judge Amnon Strashnov in the Nahum Manbar treason trial.

He did not, however, apologize for having raised the issue in a parliamentary question to the premier, despite a court gagging order on the case.

Zvilli said after Strashnov's unequivocal public denial that he had had any contact or conversations with the prime minister that he sees "the matter as closed." "I'm not prepared and don't want as a citizen and MK to throw any doubts on the credibility and integrity of an Israeli judge," he said.

The Likud immediately issued a statement calling on Zvilli to apologize for implicating the prime minister "and falsely blaming both him and Judge Strashnov."

Zvilli said he had done his duty as an MK to investigate and expose what he thought was a possible perversion of justice by the prime minister. He said he still considered his sources reliable.

Likud spokeswoman Ronit Eckstein noted that Zvilli had said at the outset of the affair that he would be happy to admit having made a mistake, "and we expect him to do that," she said. "Zvilli broke all the rules of the game in the political world, violated a gag order and mobilized on behalf of the traitor Manbar — only to hurt the prime minister."

"In Zvilli's period as Labor Party secretary-general, his party suffered the most serious blow [losing the elections], and to save himself from total defeat and out of despair he chose to stir up rumors which proved to be lies," Eckstein said.

Likud ministers put out a statement yesterday saying they agreed they "should not remain silent in face of the rumors and lies spread by senior opposition members, led by MK Nissim Zvilli, in violation of High Court gag order."

Naveh: PM never meddled in Manbar case

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN

Cabinet Secretary Dan Naveh yesterday dismissed allegations that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu meddled in the case of Nahum Manbar, who was convicted of treason last month, or that there is any fear of an inquiry into Netanyahu's involvement.

Naveh, who spoke to Army Radio, was referring to Manbar's defense attorney Amnon Zichroni's allegation that Netanyahu and Naveh were in touch with presiding Tel Aviv District Judge Amnon Strashnov during the trial.

Manbar's brother Zvi, who spoke to reporters outside the courtroom yesterday, said he believed Netanyahu wanted to turn Manbar into a scapegoat to cover up Israel's sales to Iran, which violated the US arms embargo on that state.

Zvi Manbar said that convicting his brother enabled Netanyahu, who was under pressure from the US over the violation of the embargo, to point an accusing finger at someone else.

"He didn't tell them the military industries did it with full state approval but blamed it on Manbar," he said.

Manbar told the reporters who crowded around him as he came into the courtroom "I'm innocent and I'll prove it."

Police checking who broke court ban

By DAVID RUJCE

Police continued to collect written material and details of statements yesterday as part of an investigation into whether anyone violated the publicity ban on what has become known as the Strashnov case.

The ban was imposed by the High Court of Justice on details of the petition, lodged by Nahum Manbar's lawyer Amnon Zichroni, which was apparently aimed at securing a retrial for his client.

The court on Tuesday lifted the publicity ban after details of the petition were leaked. The police investigations department was instructed by Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein to carry out an inquiry, despite the court's subsequent decision to lift the black-out.

Senior police sources revealed yesterday that the process of gathering material would continue for several days before any decision would be taken about whether to investigate any individuals in connection with the matter.

In the meantime, the State Attorney's Office has yet to decide whether to instruct the police to carry out a separate investigation into the allegations made in the petition by Zichroni and the subsequent denials and counteraccusations.

The sources said that the police were not involved in this aspect of the case at this stage and that any decision on the matter would be taken by the State Attorney's Office.

Former police inspector-general Assaf Hefetz said yesterday that the police should be cautious about opening an inquiry into the allegations raised in Zichroni's petition and the counterclaims.

"It is unnecessary to be swept along by the media, which usually presents matters in black and white terms, [wait and] see what evidence the state attorney has... I don't think that the police has to volunteer to get into this matter," Hefetz told reporters.

Another lawyer recalls arousing the judges' ire

By HAIM SHAPIRO

If anyone knows the dangers a lawyer might face by accusing a court of being biased, it is Tel Aviv attorney Yoram Sheftel.

He is the man who in February, 1987, charged that the trial of John Demjanjuk, who was accused of being "Ivan the Terrible," a sadistic Nazi prison guard, was a "show trial," in the tradition of those held in Moscow under Stalin.

Sheftel recalled during an interview that he leveled the charge on the second day of the trial, which was held at Jerusalem's Binyanei Ha'uma and broadcast on national television.

In the charged atmosphere of the courtroom, spectators screamed insults at him, including "kapo" and "Nazi." Demjanjuk was convicted of crimes against the Jewish people and sentenced to death by the Jerusalem District Court in 1988. But the conviction and sentence were overturned by the Supreme Court in 1993, and Demjanjuk went free.

Sheftel said yesterday that his charge was only publicly justified five years after he made it, by former Supreme Court justice Haim Cohn.

Attorney Yoram Sheftel.

(Isaac Harari)

After he retired, Cohn said that the Demjanjuk trial had been a "spectacle," a term which Sheftel said in legal terms meant a show trial.

Sheftel said that after he had made his accusation, many judges called him into their chambers, patted him on the back and shook his hand to congratulate him for his bravery in standing up to the court and the crowd of hostile spectators.

"I never felt it caused me any damage. It only brought me respect for my courage," Sheftel said.

Regarding the charges brought by attorney Amnon Zichroni against Tel Aviv District Judge Amnon Strashnov, Sheftel said that if there is any basis to what Zichroni is saying, then he not only has just reason to raise the issue, but a sacred duty.

The basis for bringing such charges is relative, Sheftel said. It does not mean proof beyond a reasonable doubt, such as one would need for a conviction in court, but that which an average jurist would find reasonable.

However, Sheftel added, in this particular case, based only upon what he had read in the media, Sheftel doubted there is a reasonable foundation for Zichroni's allegations.

According to the media accounts, Sheftel said, it appeared that Strashnov's only proof was the statement of a person who had been described as being of doubtful mental stability.

Gov't to follow Assad visit to Paris

By JAY BUSHINSKY
and news agencies

If Syrian President Hafez Assad's upcoming trip to Paris results in Syria's consent to resume negotiations with Israel "we will be ready," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said yesterday.

Israeli interest in the Assad visit, however, centers on two issues: the possibility that the Syrian leader will let Lebanon accept Israel's offer to evacuate the security zone north of the Israeli-Lebanese border in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 425, and expectations that President Jacques Chirac will elicit new information about the whereabouts of fugitive Nazi Alois Brunner.

"We are following Assad's talks with French leaders with interest," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Aviv Shir-On.

A senior source said talks were held between Israeli and French officials on the eve of Assad's trip to France and further deliberations will take place after he concludes his visit.

In an interview with France's Channel 1 television before leaving Damascus, Assad warned Israel's Western friends that many countries would suffer if the Middle East does not achieve peace. "The peace process does not concern Syria alone but the whole world. If we accomplish nothing, wars will flare up and will spill over into many countries in direct or indirect ways," Assad declared.

But, for the first time Assad suggested outright his willingness to meet Netanyahu if Israel withdrew from the Golan Heights. "Once peace is established, it is completely natural that people should talk to each other. Otherwise we would not be realistic. If the problems are solved, relations would be normal," he said.

But he slammed Netanyahu for hindering the peace prospects, saying his insistence on starting peace talks with Syria from zero meant that there could not be peace.

"We are the ones who advanced the peace process, we got results, we will not restart talks except from where we left them. If [Netanyahu] continues with this position, there will be no peace. Syria will not offer Netanyahu a part of its lands. We do not want to do anything which could anger our people and create an internal conflict in our country," he said.

"[Netanyahu] rejects the rules on which the peace process is based - peace in return for land," Assad said. "Netanyahu says he wants peace for peace which means he wants peace and to keep the land."

Assad's three-day trip to France, which begins today, will be his first visit in 22 years. He will meet President Jacques Chirac today and Friday and Prime Minister Lionel Jospin separately.

Asked if he would allow a French investigating judge to visit Syria to seek information on Brunner, Assad said: "Nobody has told me that he is in Syria. And why should Syria care about this person?"

Brunner is blamed for the deaths of 130,000 Jews from Germany, Austria, France and Greece. Nazi trackers place Brunner in Syria under the alias of Georg Fischer.

Brunner was placed under formal investigation by France in 1988 for crimes against humanity. France asked for his extradition and wants a French investigating judge to go to Syria to seek information. Syria has refused. "I wonder how I, while in Syria, do not know his [Brunner's] whereabouts, while the French judge does," Assad said.

Head of Russian intelligence to meet Mordechai

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
and JAY BUSHINSKY

The head of the Russian counterintelligence and anti-terrorism agency is to meet with Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai today in Tel Aviv and will reportedly discuss Russian technology transfer to Israel.

It is expected that they will also discuss cooperation between Israel and Russian intelligence agencies.

Defense officials said Lt. Gen. Nikolai Kovalyov, director of the Federal Security Service, and other members of his delegation are to hold a working meeting this morning with Mordechai, but gave no other details.

Kovalyov is here as a guest of the General Security Service, a government official said.

"This is one of the subjects about which silence is preferable," the aide said, hinting that there is more to the FSS chief's presence here than meets the eye. "In any case, it is a positive development."

In the course of his stay, Kovalyov also will confer with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky. He will also reportedly meet Mossad head Ephraim Halevy.

Russia has denied that it has been helping the Iranians develop long-range missiles, but the US and Israel insist this is the case. Sharansky has been delegated as the government's point man in discussing this issue with American and Russian officials.

Kovalyov and his delegation are in Israel for a one week, unofficial visit.

It is thought to be the first time a Russian spy chief has ever visited Israel.

Mordechai defends the draft - for Druse

Smoking ban declared legal

Mordechai said yesterday that an inquiry by the IDF Judge Advocate General had shown that an order by a battalion commander to ban smoking on base was a legal one. The commander sent two soldiers to military jail for contravening the order.

Answering a parliamentary question by MK David Tal (Shas), Mordechai said although the commander had determined stricter rules on non-smoking than the IDF regulations demand, the order was legally binding.

He said the punishment of one of the soldiers had been reduced from a 21-day sentence to a 10-day sentence and the other soldier has not served his jail sentence.

Syria being monitored closely

"The defense establishment is strictly monitoring military developments in Syria and Syrian efforts to become equipped with advanced weapons in different fields, including anti-tank and anti-aircraft weapons," Mordechai told the Knesset yesterday in answer to a question by MK Michael Nudelman (Yisrael Ba'Aliya).

AT THE KNESSET

"Clearly the purchase of advanced weapons in these fields increases the military threat on the Syrian side towards Israel," he said, adding that the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee is being fully updated on the developments.

On Tuesday the committee was told that there is no concrete evidence that Syria intends to launch a war on Israel and that it prefers the diplomatic option for the present.

Bill to protect suspects privacy passes reading

The Knesset passed first reading of a bill by MK Tzvi Weinberg (Yisrael Ba'Aliya) which would ban the publication of the name of suspects before they have been indicted or had their remand extended, unless they themselves ask for it or their status demands the public be informed.

He said in many cases, a person detained and brought before a judge is found to be entirely clean but the publication of his detention can blacken his name.

The bill, supported by the government, passed the reading by 22 to four.

VAT exemption bill passes

The Knesset this week passed final reading of a bill by MK Yosi Stern (Yisrael Ba'Aliya) under which foreign residents would not have to pay VAT for purchases and services relating to their participation in trade fairs and exhibitions here.

Stern said the bill is an effort to encourage foreign companies to participate in such events and promote trade ties and tourism. He said it also is aimed at ensuring VAT returns for Israelis at shows and exhibitions in Europe.

MKs criticize Assi Dayan

Deputy Education and Culture Minister Moshe Peled, in a speech in the plenum yesterday, called on filmmaker Assi Dayan to return the prize money he had received from the ministry Monday following his comments last week in which he called Jerusalem "the screwed-up city" and said that the prime minister should "go to hell."

"Where is your artistic integrity?" Peled asked.

MKs of all political persuasions from Nissim Dahan (Shas) to Amnon Rubinstein (Meretz) condemned Dayan, whom Avner Shaki (National Religious Party) called "The bad boy of Israeli cinema."

Controversy over deputy speaker

A dispute has broken out between the coalition and opposition over a rotation agreement for a position as Knesset deputy speaker.

Apparently there was a verbal agreement between Labor whip Elie Goldschmidt and the heads of the two Arab factions that at the end of the summer sitting this month Labor MK Ephraim Oshaya would vacate this position in favor of one of the Arab MKs. These would be the first time there would be an Arab deputy speaker.

However coalition and Likud whip Meir Sheerit is objecting, claiming that the Arab MKs did not stand by their promise to support the appointment of Tsomet whip Eliezer Zandberg in this position when it came up a few months ago.

He said has no objections to the appointment of a deputy speaker from the Arab parties, as they claimed. "[But] unfortunately, some of the members of the Arab parties did not abide by the agreement made," Sheerit said.

New affair

"This is one of the biggest scandals in the history of the state," declares Ma'ariv's Yosef Lapid, referring to the Manbar-Strashnov affair, which has caused an unprecedented stir since the High Court of Justice lifted the publication ban on its details.

Lapid writes that it involves all the elements of a big scandal: politics, espionage and money.

Yediot Aharanot's Ron Ben-Yishai writes that the allegations are so severe that the attorney-general will have to conduct an investigation as soon as possible. "No compromise in such an affair is possible," he writes.

"The justice system is too valuable for someone to shed its blood without having substantial evidence."

Moshe Negbi agrees that an investigation is vital in this case. "Justice must not only be done but also be visible," he wrote in Ma'ariv.

Commentators specifically address MK Nissim Zylbi's accusation that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu intervened in the Nabum Manbar trial.

Ma'ariv's Shalom Yerushalmi does not doubt that Netanyahu will find his way out of the entanglement, but is puzzled why the prime minister always gets himself into these situations.

Enuna Elon in Yediot is certain that Netanyahu has nothing to do with this affair and criticizes those who are persistent in blemishing his reputation. "They [the accusers] will not wait for the results of the investigation, when the current unchecked state of the 'Strashnov affair' can help them undermine the credibility of the terrible Netanyahu who stole away their country," she writes.

"It is clear that the stain on the justice system, not only on Netanyahu, will not be immediately removed," writes Ben-Dror Yemini in Ma'ariv.

Ma'ariv's Chemi Shalev concludes that this case can severely hurt the legal system if the allegations will prove to be true.

"Only a state investigative committee will be able to fill the black hole that has unexpectedly gaped open in our image of a state seeking law and justice," he writes.

A big step

Commentators expressed their opinions on the improving status among the nations of the Palestinians, in contrast to Israel's deteriorating reputation.

Oded Granot, in Ma'ariv, refers to the unique status that the United Nations has granted the Palestinians, stating that "it is an additional small step for [Palestinian Authority Yasser] Arafat, but a big step for the Palestinian state on the way."

Granot attempts to draw the government's attention to the fact that the negotiations over the second redeployment may be stuck, but the Palestinians are getting stronger. "The Palestinian train has left the station a long time ago, it is riding full steam ahead, and nothing can stop it."

Who's guilty?

A year after the Maccabiah bridge disaster claimed the lives of members of the Australian team, Ana Isakova of Ma'ariv protests against what she terms a "find-the-guilty-party game."

She criticizes the process in which responsibility for mishaps slides down to the lower levels and those truly responsible get away from punishment.

"He who stands at the top of the responsibility ladder should go home," Isakova writes.

SHARON

"But in reality our discussions are about the state's actual survival."

Sharon criticized the way in which Israeli officials sought a meeting with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat or one of his deputies.

"We, Israel, are the ones who are giving something to the Palestinians," he said. "Instead of Arafat asking for a meeting with us, we are begging him to meet us so that we can receive 14 percent of the West Bank."

He termed this "a strange situation."

Mordechai's bureau called the PA to request a meeting between him and Arafat, but the Palestinians suggested that he see Arafat's deputy, Mahmoud Abbas.

However, neither a date nor a venue has been set for a Mordechai-Abbas meeting.

A senior PA official agreed. He said that so far Arafat has not given his negotiators any authority to make changes in the US plan. He said the PA chief would prefer to make concessions to Washington rather than to Israel.

For his part, Erekat said the PA has been reassured that direct talks will not lead to US pressure to amend Washington's proposal for the handover of 13.1 percent of the West Bank to full Palestinian control. It would also not mean US pressure on Arafat to reconvene the Palestinian National Council to amend the Palestinian National Covenant, he said.

"The US says that the position on 13.1% won't change and the position on the covenant won't change," he said.

Erekat said the PA will refuse to discuss any changes in the US plan. Instead, PA negotiators will raise their original proposal for an IDF pullout from 40% of the West Bank as the second further redeployment. This would include the first redeployment, which was never carried out by Israel because of PA opposition to the size of the proposed Israeli withdrawal.

PA officials said their willingness to hold direct talks with Israel is part of their effort to show the US that Israel is responsible for the breakdown in the peace process. They said that until this week the PA had conditioned a return to direct talks with Israel on an announcement by the Netanyahu government that it accepts the US plan. Arafat, meanwhile, said Beijing had pledged financial support to the PA.

After three days of meetings with Chinese leaders, including President Jiang Zemin and Premier Zhu Rongji, Arafat said Beijing's support was "very important for the Palestinian cause and struggle."

"We signed agreements between Palestine and China for Chinese financial backing for the Palestinian Authority," Arafat said, without elaborating.

Britain donates funds to Holocaust survivors

By DOUGLAS DAVIS

LONDON. — British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook yesterday announced that a £1 million contribution to ease the plight of Holocaust survivors will be handed over to the Board of Deputies of British Jews and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

This marks the first time that British money will be distributed to Holocaust survivors. The contribution is expected to be made immediately.

The funds were pledged by the British government at the Nazi Gold Conference in London last December and led to further pledges totalling $57 million by the US, Argentina, Austria, Croatia, Greece, Luxembourg, Brazil, the Czech Republic, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Poland, Slovakia and Sweden.

One-third of the British contribution will go to the Board of Deputies to aid needy survivors in Britain, while the remaining two-thirds will go to the Joint Distribution Committee, through the World Jewish Restitution Organization. The money will go to projects providing medical care to needy survivors in Ukraine, Belarus, Russia and Moldova.

"We all have a responsibility to ensure that people who survived the greatest crime of our times do not lack the material support they need during their remaining years," Cook said yesterday.

The fund was launched to provide speedy and practical help to those people, especially those who have suffered under both Nazism and Communism. This help will be administered by highly effective organizations which work tirelessly to give them support.

He added that nothing could erase the scars of those persecuted by the Nazis, "but the fund can at least ensure that they can grow old with dignity, freed from the misery of poverty."

Board of Deputies Director-General Neville Nagler said that two-thirds of the board's allocation would be given to those who are already known to be in need. The remaining one-third will be held back for those who are not known, but may come forward later.

The board has already established a committee which comprises representatives of organizations working with survivors to decide on the disbursement of the funds and to assess claims.

The British government's decision, Nagler said, represents "a very real and tangible recognition of the suffering and distress that have been experienced by survivors of the Holocaust living in Britain today."

Both the Board of Deputies and the Joint Distribution Committee have agreed to consider applications from non-Jewish victims of Nazi persecution on the same basis as those from Jewish survivors.

Religious officials assure Knesset panel on posthumous circumcisions

By LIAT COLLINS

After an emotional meeting on reports that some burial societies are posthumously circumcising immigrant Jews before burying them, members of the Knesset Immigration and Absorption Committee called on the Chief Rabbinate to ensure that this only takes place with the approval of the dead man's family.

The Religious Affairs Ministry spokesman later said that circumcisions without such permission were isolated incidents, and that burial societies have been warned against the practice.

The arguments in committee ran along religious-secular lines. Religious MKs said posthumous circumcision is no worse than conducting autopsies — which they object to — while secular MKs described it as the ultimate in religious coercion.

"Only I am responsible for my sexual organs. Me and no one else," said Meretz leader Yossi Sarid, who initiated the debate. "The religious establishment is not only taking control of our lives, it is controlling our deaths."

He said a posthumous circumcision should not be carried out without the prior permission of the dead man or his family.

"If [a man] did not ask for it during his lifetime, this decision should be respected," Sarid said.

"Why do you object to a circumcision, but when we're talking about an operation taking out the heart, lungs and other organs you don't have a problem?" asked Yitzhak Vaknin (Shas).

Vaknin said that in autopsies, organs are removed and sometimes not buried for more than a year.

Ophir Pines (Labor) described posthumous circumcision as "perverted and sick" and "a form of idol worship."

Pines said he had filed a police complaint over circumcisions done without the family's consent, as he believes it violates the Anatomy and Pathology Law.

He called for the Religious Affairs Ministry not to renew the licenses of burial societies that carry out such circumcisions.

Vaknin said that some secular MKs are trying to do everything to blacken the names of the baredim and Judaism.

However, he agreed that, as with autopsies, posthumous circumcisions should take place only with the family's approval.

Deputy Religious Affairs Minister Arye Gamliel (Shas) and Rabbi Zelig Braverman, who heads the ministry's burial department, told the committee the ministry had never approved the practice.

Ya'akov Rogot, head of the Tel Aviv Burial Society, told the committee the custom of posthumous circumcision appears in halacha, but his society stopped performing it as a matter of course in 1991, after a ruling by Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, one of the great halachic authorities of this generation.

Committee chairwoman Naomi Blumenthal said even if there had been only a handful of cases, the practice defies the dead.

Religious Affairs Ministry spokesman Yair Wolf said yesterday that only in very rare and isolated incidents had dead men been circumcised without their families' knowledge. The ministry had made clear to the burial societies that this was not to be done in the future.

However, he added that according to halacha, it is forbidden to bury an uncircumcised person among Jews, and those who are not circumcised are usually buried in cemeteries for those not halachically Jewish.

He added that the ministry has appealed to the Chief Rabbinate Council for a ruling on the issue.

Doctors, consumer groups decry co-payments to health funds

By JUDY SEGEL

The Israel Medical Association reacted angrily to the Knesset Finance Committee's vote — which could be amended or overturned in a re-vote on Monday — to institute a system of direct "co-payments" to health funds by all residents.

The IMA demanded that instead, the existing 4.8% payroll tax for health services be raised by 0.1% or 0.2%.

IMA chairman Dr. Yoram Blachar said the plan has aroused "great dissatisfaction" among the country's doctors, who have — all along — "opposed the levying of an additional tax" on health fund members.

Blachar said that the "basic problems of the health system result from the lack of an agreed-upon apparatus for updating the medical expenditures index; this would give true expression to the costs of health services."

"Instead, the public has become a cow to be milked to cover the system's deficits," he said.

The co-payment system, heaped upon health taxes, "will eliminate all incentives to solve the real problems of the health system," he added.

The IMA opposes requiring patients to pay for a visit to the doctor, because "this is liable to bar access of sectors in the population to health care, and public health will be endangered."

In the long run, Blachar said, late diagnosis of disease and delayed hospitalization will cost the public purse even more.

"First and foremost, the Treasury must allocate the funds to which it originally committed itself," to cover the gap between health taxes and the basket of health services.

Civil and consumer rights groups also denounced the scheme.

The Finger on the Pulse coalition, a roof body of 30 organizations supporting an egalitarian health insurance system, said co-payments were another step towards creating dual-level medical care, one for the rich and another for the poor. The employers' tax abolished last year should be reinstated to help finance the health system, the group said.

Dr. Bruce Rosen, a senior researcher on health issues at the IDC-Brookdale Institute in Jerusalem, said he favored increasing the health tax by as little as possible while significantly increasing the tax on tobacco products as an alternative to the "faux" co-payment system.

In this way, healthy behavior would be encouraged, and people whose habits cause them to become ill will help pay for their extra medical costs.

Rosen also advocated suits by the health funds and the government against the tobacco companies, adding that his institute will soon launch a study into the economic and social costs of smoking in Israel.

Rosen said that if the co-payment system is implemented and weaker elements in society are exempted from some of the fees, the health funds would try to discourage such people from being members unless they were compensated by the government.

Most of the health funds were reluctant to comment yesterday, preferring to wait until Monday to see if the co-payment scheme is finally approved.

The Kupat Holim Meuhedet spokesman said tersely that the plan was "a step in the right direction, but that higher health taxes would have been a better one, as collections, exemptions and other arrangements will be a headache."

Clalit and Leumi declined to voice an opinion, but Maccabi finance director Yitzhak Ganor said his health fund favored the plan "because it restores the direct financial link between the insurers and their members" that was cancelled by the national health insurance law.

Competition among the health funds may increase, he said, because each insurer had the option of offering more or different services and cutting some payment rates.

"Raising the cigarette tax substantially would have been preferable, however, but the government refuses to do that," Ganor said.

Health Ministry deputy director-general for information Yair Amikam said the ministry has "not yet considered" a variety of technical complications posed by the new arrangement, including members' refusal to pay, knowing when families have reached quarterly payment ceilings and appeals for exemptions.

"Most of this will be up to the health funds to decide," he said.

Health Minister Yehoshua Matza had preferred a higher health tax than the co-payments, but he didn't get his way.

"However, at least — if the plan is passed on Monday — the Finance Ministry will allocate the NIS 300 million it promised to reduce the deficits."

Rules to be updated on food product storage

By JUDY SEGEL

Health Ministry regulations on the storage of food products in wholesale and retail establishments will be updated following the contamination of a handful of Coca-Cola bottles in the store-room of a Rehovot grocery.

The ministry said that existing food supervision regulations already require separation of food from contaminants, but it will issue updates within a few days "that will better define storage conditions of food products, including beverages in supermarkets and grocery stores."

A draft of the regulations was sent by officials to the Justice Ministry for consideration.

When the Ribak Committee appointed by the Health Ministry completes its investigation into the alleged contamination of 16 Coca-Cola bottles with spilled paint thinner, the ministry will publish the conclusions.

Israel Consumer Council director Ariella Ravdel-Nedkov demanding that the ministry and the police publicize details of their investigation of the incident.

In a letter to ministry associate director-general Dr. Boaz Lev, she said the authorities must do more to protect public health and prevent contamination of food products in storage.

Contractors lapsed on precautions for Maccabiah bridge — prosecution

The prosecution tried to show yesterday that contractors for last year's Maccabiah Games opening ceremonies took safety precautions in every area except the construction of a footbridge that collapsed, killing four Australian athletes.

An engineer and a set designer testified in Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court about their work on installations inside the stadium where the opening ceremonies were held last July 14.

The Australian team was on its way to the stadium when the bridge collapsed, throwing the athletes into the polluted Yarkon River below. Four team members died and dozens were injured.

Two contractors, the engineer who designed the bridge, the director of the games and the chairman of the Maccabiah organizing committee are on trial on charges of negligent homicide and building without proper permits.

Yesterday, engineer Sasson Assif testified that he oversaw construction and checked the safety of installations such as a lighting tower inside the stadium and the entrance gates to the stadium.

Assif said he was not informed about the construction of the footbridge. "I was not even aware of it," he said.

Prosecutor Hadass Forer-Gafni noted that while the contractor hired Assif to oversee construction inside the stadium, no one was hired to check out the safety of the bridge.

Judge Edna Beckenstein asked Assif whether he would have ordered someone to oversee construction of the bridge if he had been in charge of it, and Assif said, "Yes."

Another witness, Dov Ben-David, testified about his design for the stage set for the opening ceremonies. Forer-Gafni said she called Ben-David "to show that the Maccabiah invested serious effort in the way it presented itself and in the way it dealt with other issues, except for the bridge."

Also testifying briefly yesterday was a policeman who drove an ATV across the bridge the day before the collapse. (AP)

Swiss choir serenades Holocaust survivors

NEW YORK (AP) — A Swiss boys choir on a US concert tour with a mission to strengthen cultural ties and bridge cultural divides has made an important first stop — at a nursing home for Holocaust survivors in New York.

"The boys wanted to perform for the Jewish community to show that there are many more sides to Switzerland than are read about in newspapers today," said Ambassador Jacques Reverdin, the consul general of Switzerland in New York.

On Tuesday afternoon, the ambassador accompanied 71 members of the Zurich Boys Choir, which arrived in New York on Monday, to the Margaret Tietz Center for Nursing Care in the borough of Queens.

The "Singing Switzerland" program featured works by Mozart and Felix Mendelssohn and a capella folk music in German, French, Italian and Romansch, the languages of Switzerland. It was sponsored by Credit Suisse and UBS, the banks involved in negotations with US officials over hidden Holocaust-era accounts.

The mini-concert was greeted with energetic applause and even tears by the center's 200 elderly and ailing residents.

"It was so nice for a generation many years removed from mine to come here in this gesture of goodwill," said Alice Schiff, 95, who escaped the Nazis by fleeing Berlin in the 1930s for Brussels, Zurich, Paris, Rome and then Jerusalem.

The center's residents, whose average age is 80, cleared their cafeteria and recreation room of folding chairs and tables for the boys. They sat in armchairs and wheelchairs or leaned on walkers. Some sang softly along in German while the boys, whose average age is about 12, performed.

Most of the seniors stayed seated but chanted "Bravo, bravo" after star soprano Daniel Hellmann, 12, led the choir in Max Reger's "Lullaby of Maria" and "The Goatherd" in French.

IDF confiscates sheep in firing range

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
and STEVE RODAN

Stone-throwing Beduin shepherds clashed with IDF troops after the army confiscated their flocks from a firing range in the Judean Desert yesterday.

The soldiers fired rubber bullets and tear gas at hundreds of rioting Beduin and at least 30 people were slightly injured. Twelve were hospitalized at Bethlehem's Hussein Hospital with rubber bullet wounds and 20 for tear gas inhalation, Palestinians said. Hospital officials said none suffered any serious injuries.

The incident began when IDF and Civil Administration officials caught Beduin grazing their sheep in the hills south of the settlement of Ma'aleh Amos. They told the shepherds that the area was a firing range, that they were violating the law by entering it and started confiscating the sheep.

The angry shepherds return to their village of Arab al-Rashideh and rounded up the entire clan — men, women and children — and hundreds of them started throwing stones at the soldiers and Civil Administration officials. They also burned tires and blocked the road as their 140 sheep were loaded on to trucks.

Reinforcements were sent in and quelled the protest using tear gas and rubber bullets, the army said. The jeeps suffered from serious body damage from the stones, military sources said.

Lt. Peter Lerner, spokesman for the Civil Administration, said that the sheep were being held in "protective custody" in a pen in the Jordan Valley and would only be released after their owners paid a fine and the expenses for holding them.

"The sheep were confiscated for being on a firing zone. Any firing zone is dangerous and I am sure the owners of the livestock would prefer to have them removed than be fired at," Lerner said. "It was for their own protection."

"The Beduin got angry because they didn't understand what was happening," Lerner added.

Temper had subsided by the afternoon and the road was cleared.

Earlier in the day, the Palestinian Authority said that Jewish settlers fired several shots at a PA police patrol in the Bethlehem area. PA officials said the shooting took place near Solomon's Pool, south of Bethlehem, around noon. They said one bullet hit the police jeep.

Nobody was injured in the shooting, officials said. They said the PA reported this to the Bethlehem office of the District Coordinating Office, where the IDF and PA police investigate complaints of violence.

A Jewish settlers' group, the Committee for Road Safety, announced that its members had hurled stones at a Palestinian police patrol during a confrontation, but denied that it used firearms.

Judea and Samaria Police spokesman Opher Sivan confirmed that a group of settlers did throw stones at the PA, but said that no shots were fired. Sivan said police have a suspect in mind, but he has not been detained yet. Lerner said that a police investigation into the matter had found that it was a stone which hit the window and not a bullet.

Meanwhile, the PA is recruiting thousands of youngsters into what officials say is a paramilitary force that will train the youngsters in civil defense in a program supervised by Palestinian military commanders.

Voice of Palestine Radio reported that 10,500 young men will be trained in 64 camps around the territories, including in the areas of Bethlehem, Hebron, Ramallah, Nablus, Tulkarm and Salfit. The ministries involved are the Education and Culture Ministry and the Sports and Youth Ministry.

Palestinian legislator urges attacks to protest Israeli policy

By STEVE RODAN

A Palestinian Legislative Council member who for years headed a movement dedicated to reconciliation between Arabs and Jews has called for violent attacks by Palestinians to protest Israeli policy in Jerusalem.

In an interview published last week in the Amman-based newspaper Al-Sabeel, Ziad Abu Ziyad called on Palestinians to proceed along "the right way." There have been cases of rock-throwing in Jerusalem and the Israeli measure has heightened anti-occupation sentiments on the Palestinian street. This is what the Arab population can do on the ground.

Abu Ziyad indicated that the Palestinian Authority is in coordination with what he termed the "masses on the streets." That is, while the PA continues to proceed with efforts to implement an Israeli redeployment in the West Bank. "The public is active in terms of resistance and mass action," he said.

In the 1980s, Abu Ziyad founded the Hebrew-language Geshet newspaper, which he said was dedicated to reconciliation between Arabs and Jews.

Fluent in Hebrew, he quickly became a key Fatah activist in Jerusalem and his name is being raised as a candidate for a position in the PA Cabinet.

In the interview, Abu Ziyad ruled out military confrontation between the PA and Israel. He said without Arab military involvement, the PA will not act alone.

"Do you want me to say that Palestinian tanks and rockets are waiting for Arab tanks, aircraft and navies to move before they act?" Abu Ziyad asked. "What do you expect the Palestinian Authority to do?"

The PLC member said the PA would not satisfy Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and order a halt to the peace process. Such a move by the Palestinians, he said, would first have to be preceded by preparations for war.

"Before I first decide to suspend the negotiations, I must make sure that I have the options of war," he said.

"The Arabs are now generally in a sorry state; they are in retreat; their ranks are in disarray; their morale is down. Against this background, Netanyahu would like nothing better than to see the negotiations grind to a halt."

Abu Ziyad ruled out a resumption of suicide bombings, saying this would allow Israel to annex more Palestinian territory.

The PLC member said the Palestinians entered the Oslo process out of weakness and because of lack of support from the Arab world. For the PA to abandon Oslo, he said, would lead to an Israeli invasion of PA territories. "We are not prepared for that," he said.

UN human rights watchdog grills Israel

GENEVA (Reuters) — Israel was put on the stand before a United Nations human-rights watchdog in Geneva yesterday to answer to allegations of torture, discrimination and detention without trial.

Human-rights groups sought the condemnation of Israel by the UN Human Rights Committee, whose 18 independent experts scrutinize states' compliance with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

High on the agenda was Israel's treatment of Palestinians in the territories, days after a snub in New York where UN member states voted overwhelmingly in favor of an Arab-sponsored motion to enhance Palestine status at the world body.

This is the first time Israel has faced the spotlight at the UN forum, where it is presenting a report overdue since 1993. The body issues proposals to countries accused of rights abuses but has no power to apply sanctions, except the pressure from its international lawyers to embarrass and cajole.

Many of the 140 UN member states that have signed the covenant rarely, if ever, submit monitoring reports.

Israel has long tried to argue that it should not be required to report on the territories. It was attacked in Geneva by the New York-based rights group Human Rights Watch for not mentioning the territories in its report.

"This report seriously misrepresents Israel's human-rights record," Human Rights Watch executive director for the Middle East and North Africa, Hanny Megally, said in a statement.

The lawyers pressed Israel on many fronts: what is it doing about the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people in the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip, on rights abuses in the territories, on deaths in custody and alleged torture.

Israel was expected to respond today.

Human Rights Watch accused Israel of torture and detention of individuals as "hostages" and called for its condemnation.

Israel has rejected allegations that the General Security Service uses torture while interrogating Palestinian and other detainees.

Only 2 knapsacks pass Consumer Council test

Only two of six knapsacks checked by Budak, the magazine of the Israel Consumer Council, both made by the Modan company, met the national standards, council reported recently.

The "Flick" knapsack, retailing for NIS 99, was the best one by far, meeting or exceeding all the test criteria, even though it was cheaper than almost all the others, the council said. The next best, costing NIS 146.99, bears Modan's own name. Knapsacks should have a stiff back, to distribute the weight of the contents evenly. The straps should be at least 3 cm. wide — the wider the better. Elementary school children should carry no more than 3.5 kg., while older kids can carry up to 6 kg. Jerusalem Post Staff

The course was initiated by Swiss Jewish organizations following a rise in antisemitism in Switzerland due to the revelations regarding Swiss banks, Nazi gold and survivors' assets.

The head of the Swiss delegation stated that the teachers knew very little about the Holocaust and antisemitism and will use their newfound knowledge to examine Swiss textbooks' coverage of the Holocaust and their historical accuracy. Jerusalem Post Staff

New village planned for Druse IDF veterans

By DAVID RUDGE

A new village — the first of its kind in the country — is to be established in the Galilee for demobilized soldiers and members of the security forces from the Druse community.

The decision to set up such a community was made by the Defense Ministry and the ministerial committee headed by National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon for the development of the Galilee and the Negev.

The announcement was made by Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai during a recent IDF rally in the Galilee Druse village of Hurfeish to salute the Druse and Circassian communities.

The Defense Ministry is discussing the possibility of establishing a special Nahal Druse unit which would lay the groundwork for the proposed new village.

The decision to establish such a new settlement for demobilized

Druse is seen as an expression of gratitude by the state to the Israeli Druse community for their contribution to the country.

In contrast, nearly 40 Druse women from the Golan Heights have been staging a hunger strike since the beginning of the week at the home of late Druse spiritual leader Sheikh Amin Tarif in the Galilee village of Julis.

The hunger-striking women are protesting the Interior Ministry's refusal to rescind the Israeli citizenship of around 400 Druse on the Golan Heights.

The majority of the Druse community there refused to accept Israeli identity cards after the government's decision in 1981 to extend Israeli law to the Golan.

Prior to then, the area had been ruled by a military administration. Those with Israeli citizenship complained to Interior Minister Eli Shussan that they were being boycotted by Druse religious leaders on the Golan, who are all predominantly pro-Syria.

They asked Shussan when he visited the region two months ago to consider their request to rescind their Israeli citizenship because of the social and religious problems this had created for them, as well as their children who had reached the age of 18.

Shussan, following top-level discussions with government leaders and members of the security services, announced recently that there was no legal or other way of rescinding the Israeli citizenship of those Druse who held it.

The spokeswoman for the Interior Ministry said the decision had been taken at the highest levels and that despite the hunger strike by the Golan Heights Druse women, nothing more could be done.

The Syrian interest

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara expressed strong pessimism about the Middle East's situation and the prospects for peace, says the Syrian newspaper, Al-Baath.

But it didn't report whether he was smiling at the time. After all, a terrible regional situation and no progress toward peace is the best possible thing for Syrian interests.

With Syrian President Hafez Assad visiting Paris for one of his rare foreign trips, and with Russian military sales on the upswing, Damascus seems to be in better diplomatic shape than usual.

This doesn't mean, though, there is much chance of war with Israel either. On the contrary, the Syrians know they can't really rely on anyone for political or military support in the event of such a conflict.

Assad's army may look good on paper but the numbers are inflated by obsolete and poorly maintained weapons. The gap between Russian and US-made weapons is sure to grow even further. While General Ali Assiyan has just been appointed chief of staff, replacing General Hisham Shehawi who had seemed to have a life-time appointment, effective military reform is years away at best.

And Syria's greatest secret is that it wants neither war nor peace. It's fairly happy with the existing situation.

That statement may seem strange. Still, analysis of Syrian interests and goals is more shrouded by myth or lack of serious thought than almost any other Middle East question.

To put it plainly: peace with Israel, even in exchange for the entire Golan, would be disastrous for Syria; not because of some blind, fanatic faith, but due to the most pragmatic interests of its regime.

Here's a short list of relevant factors:

1. If Israel becomes a normal part of Middle Eastern politics, it will always — with the exception of opposing a strong Iraq — side with Syria's opponents. Israel is already allied with Jordan and Turkey. It could work with Egypt and even an independent Palestinian state more easily than with Damascus.

2. Striking an Israel-Syria peace pact would generate an Israel-Lebanon treaty as well. From that moment, no matter what the treaties actually say, Syria's grip on Lebanon would weaken. Israel could also gain influence among independent-minded Lebanese parties. Losing Lebanon as a satellite would entail massive financial losses to Syria's elite, which is thriving on smuggling and other enterprises via and inside Lebanon.

3. A successful Israel-Palestinian peace process, including the creation of a Palestinian state, would rob Syria of the Palestinian card which it has found so useful during the last 30 years.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat would prefer Egypt, Iraq, and other Arab states to any dependence on a country which has repeatedly stabbed him in the back.

4. Without being a front-line state in the struggle against Israel, Syria would be reduced to a fourth-rate power. It would have little leverage to pry aid out of oil-exporting Arab states.

5. The oft-touted economic benefits of peace for Syria would really be almost zero. Western companies are not going to rush into Syria to invest. Prospects for economic aid are very dim given the situation in East Asia, the former USSR, and the general tendency to speed money at home. At any rate, Syria's government does not want to make reforms that would reduce its hold on the economy.

6. Regional peace would increase US influence, a scary prospect for Syrian leaders.

7. Domestically, peace would have a double disadvantage. On one hand, critics of a dictatorship based largely on a minority ethnic community would whisper that Assad is a traitor to Arabism and, to all previous Syrian history. On the other hand, any increased openness to Western investment or influence would weaken the regime further.

Thus, Syria is happy to make trouble for a stalled peace process which already has enough problems. Like other radical forces, it can say, "We told you the Israelis didn't want peace."

Unfortunately, Assad's French hosts seem more than willing to help him make the situation worse by trying to sponsor a conference with the Arabs that would exclude Israel, and by selling arms to Syria.

To understand Syrian behavior during the last decade, and its conduct in negotiations with Israel, one must consider the above factors.

Yet Syria's entire geopolitical position is usually ignored by analysts and politicians, who endlessly repeat the simple maxim that "Assad is ready to make peace, but he's just holding out for a better deal."

The fact is that the previous Israeli government offered Syria the entire Golan in exchange for full peace and limited security guarantees. Syria turned down this deal and suspended negotiations in early 1996.

This all happened before the election of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

No matter who is Israel's prime minister, prospects for Israel-Syria peace are as close to zero as politics can allow; as are the prospects for war.

Japan's latest political mayhem raises fears of gridlock

By SONNI EFFRON and VALERIE REITMAN

TOKYO — It could take up to eight tumultuous days to choose Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto's successor, and the Japanese fear that they could face protracted political gridlock and end up with a new government no more capable of swift reform than the one that fell when Hashimoto resigned.

Voters here, anxious over the foundering economy and fed up with political dithering, gave Hashimoto and his ruling Liberal Democratic Party, or LDP, a drubbing in elections for the upper house of Parliament Sunday; he announced Monday that he would quit over the debacle.

Several financial analysts, long ago grown gloomy over the slow pace of Japanese financial reform, saw little hope that a new LDP-led government would differ substantially from its predecessor.

Kenneth Courtis, Deutsche Bank's senior economist, predicted "more political paralysis, more indecision by the government, at the very moment when Japan has to click into gear and move ahead with strong policies on what has become a massive crisis situation."

If the situation is not reversed, then it is going to be very difficult to stabilize the rest of Asia, Courtis added, expressing a global consensus that unless Japan's economy markedly improves, it will be difficult for Tokyo to help boost its regional neighbors and avert analysts' worst-case scenario in which the Japanese doldrums even drag down American fortunes.

But others express hope that the unexpected rejection by voters could jolt the LDP survivors into high gear on fixing the ailing Japanese economy after seven years of delay.

"Although the result was a bullet through the brain for the good Mr. Hashimoto, it was only a kick up the backside for the LDP," concluded ING Barings analyst Pelham Smithers.

"If the party leaders get their skates on, we could see the sort of Japanese businessmen in downtown Tokyo walk past a giant screen broadcasting PM Hashimoto's resignation announcement Monday. Many voters expect his successors to offer more of the same. (AP) actions that the market is looking for," including tax cuts to stimulate Japan's economy and fast action on this nation's huge bad-loan crisis.

LDP members are to meet July 21 to select a new prime minister who would take office July 27. Technically, Hashimoto will remain prime minister until then, though he announced Monday he was calling off a scheduled July 22 visit to the United States.

In Washington, there was a sense of disappointment that President Clinton now would not get the chance to strengthen US-Japan relations by feting Hashimoto with full pomp for what was to be the first official visit to America by a Japanese prime minister in 11 years.

Such an overt display of the importance of the ties between the two allies was considered especially important to soothe Japan's concerns after Clinton's trip to China earlier this month.

State Department spokesman James P. Rubin stressed Monday that Hashimoto's resignation "would not alter the strong nature of our relationship with Japan. But he also underscored the need for any new Japanese government to move decisively to resolve the country's economic crisis."

The United States and other major industrial nations have expressed grave concern that unless Japan gets its economy growing at a healthy clip again, the Japanese may buy fewer goods and services from America, as well as their Asian neighbors, while shipping more of theirs to foreign shores.

Business leaders in Japan warned that delay in selecting Hashimoto's successor will trigger a run on Japanese stocks and the yen.

They called for the swift formation of a unity government that would put politics aside while Japan battles out legislation on permanent tax cuts and a "total plan" for bailing out and then restructuring Japan's debt-laden banks.

But victorious and emboldened opposition forces showed no inclination to cooperate with the weakened LDP, and the Asahi newspaper joined the opposition in calling for snap elections for the lower house of Parliament, where the LDP still controls a comfortable majority.

Under the Japanese system, real legislative power is concentrated in the lower, not the upper house; the lower house actually names the prime minister, ratifies international al treaties, approves the budget and can even override resistance to bills from the upper house.

Political analysts predicted the battered LDP, which won only 44 of the 126 upper-house seats for grabs in this election, will put off new lower-house elections for as long as it can — until the legal deadline in the year 2000 if possible.

Instead, the LDP will probably try to form a coalition with some elements of the opposition. The most likely candidate is the Komeito, or Clean Government Party, the political arm of the Soka Gakkai, Japan's 8 million-strong lay Buddhist organization.

For months before Sunday's electoral rout, the LDP had been courting the Clean Government Party, with Hashimoto even apologizing to Daisaku Ikeda, Soka Gakkai's controversial leader, for negative campaign tactics in the 1996 election focusing on Ikeda's personal life.

But Komeito members still harbor hurt feelings, and its leaders have so far categorically rejected the LDP as a suitor, Soka Gakkai spokeswoman Rie Tsunuma said.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Party of Japan, one of the winners in Sunday's contest, was feeling out other opposition parties about a possible anti-LDP coalition.

The Japanese public does not have much faith that even Sunday's rout would make much of a difference in Japanese politics.

Keio University pollster Yoshiaki Kobayashi found that 73.4 percent of those surveyed did not believe that the election would make politicians listen to the voice of the people.

Disgust continued to run deep after the election, with many Japanese saying they felt even a new prime minister would change little.

"No matter who gets the job next, the result will be just the same," said Yoko Ito, a Tokyo housewife who lodged her protest vote with the Communist Party. "Why don't you send in a good person from America to do the job? Japanese politicians are hopeless." (LA Times)

Did Shakespeare want to be a Catholic priest?

By NICKLA GIBSON

HOUGHTON TOWER, England — But for a twist of fate William Shakespeare might have been a Roman Catholic priest-spy at peril of being hanged, drawn and quartered instead of applauded by Protestant England's Queen Elizabeth I.

This is the theory of British professor Richard Wilson who, with aristocrat Sir Bernard de Houghton, plans to spend 20 million pounds ($32.5 million) turning a stately home in northwest England into a research and performance center for Shakespeare.

Wilson, professor of Renaissance studies at Lancaster University, believes Houghton Tower was once used as a " Jesuit clearing-house" from where young men would travel abroad to become priests, and that a 16-year-old Shakespeare went to the manor house after being recruited by missionary Edmund Campion.

For Sir Bernard, the owner of the hill-top country house and holder of England's second oldest baronetcy, this theory builds on a family legend that a young man called Shakespeare, who in 1580 worked for one of his ancestors as a tutor cum player, was in fact the Bard.

"If Shakespeare was Shakespeare, he was a member of a household which was for six months, it seems, nothing less than the secret college and headquarters of the English Counter Reformation," Wilson said.

He believes Campion's itinerary provides the "smoking gun" for his theory that Shakespeare planned to study abroad at a Catholic seminary, possibly Douai in northern France founded by the de Houghtons, as part of the program of Catholic resistance.

"There is this extraordinary but logical connection between the most Catholic town in the Midlands (Stafford) and the great center for Catholic patronage at Houghton," Wilson said.

"If it was his (Campion's) mission which took his converts north, it was also his catastrophe which spared the playwright the penalties of priesthood." Campion was arrested, tortured for the names of all who had helped or been persuaded by him and then hanged on December 1, 1581, by which time Alexander de Houghton had dispersed his estate and recommended Shakespeare to another patron.

"Even as the master of Houghton Tower helped his servants to new identities in the Tower of London, Campion was being tortured for their names," Wilson said.

He said this period in Shakespeare's life left an indelible mark on the Protestant court's darling as he took upon himself the secrecy and evasiveness of the Catholic world which is apparent in his plays.

Houghton Tower's Shakespeare connection is not a new theory.

Retired professor of English at Newcastle University Ernest Honigsmann suggested as much 10 years ago.

But Wilson's theory has spawned a wave of enthusiasm to create a northern center for Shakespeare and Renaissance studies.

Wilson and Sir Bernard envisage hosting seminars in the house, which has views of the Irish Sea and the Pennine mountain range.

Stage plays would be held in a 300-seat theater to be built in an adjacent cliff-face, while Houghton's 17th-century Great Barn would become extra performance space.

It is hoped the majority of the project's cost will be funded by the National Lottery and that Houghton Tower will host an annual festival of plays, including one especially commissioned modern piece. Wilson said Arthur Miller was lined up to write the first.

"Although other scholars of the Bard support the concept of a Shakespeare center in the north, saying it would loosen London and Stratford's traditional stranglehold, they say the theory, as with all theories about Shakespeare's lost years, is controversial."

Professor Kieran Ryan, head of English at Royal Holloway College of the University of London, said Shakespeare's life is simply a huge, colorful set of myths.

"But I do not think it does any harm to have one more, especially when it can provide a cultural center in another part of England that has hitherto been starved," he said. (Reuters)

Korean strikes expand

By KIM MYONG-HWAN

SEOUL (Reuters) - Thousands of South Korea's state-sector workers yesterday joined a nationwide strike initiated by unions in the heavy industrial sector.

But financial sector unions said they had delayed their work stoppages over concerns about lack of public support.

"About 100,000 workers in state companies, such as Korea Telecom, joined strikes today," said Shin Chang-hwa, spokesman for the hard-line Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU).

The KCTU said the number of strikers had risen to 151,000 from 53,000 on Tuesday when the industrial action began.

Earlier the union group had said 158,000 workers were on strike. But the Labor Ministry disputes these figures and said only around 37,000 workers were on strike nationwide.

The Ministry of Industry and Energy said the labor unrest over the past two days has cost about 80 billion won ($61 million) in lost production and $40m. in lost exports.

The strikes were called to protest against layoffs and wage cuts which have affected various key industries such as auto manufacturing and shipbuilding.

The layoffs have come in the wake of major shake-ups in the corporate sector, which have seen a rash of bankruptcies and asset sales.

The International Monetary Fund in December arranged a record-breaking $58.3 billion rescue package in exchange for massive restructuring of what was until last year the world's 11th largest economy.

The KCTU said major work sites left idle from early Tuesday included car makers Hyundai Motor Co, Daewoo Heavy Industries Co. and many car parts makers.

Financial unions under the KCTU said they had decided to delay an all-out strike until after July 22.

The KCTU has 74 member unions under its wing representing 13,000 workers in the financial sector.

The country's leading financial-sector union group, which is not under the KCTU, said it had also decided to put off a planned strike.

"We are still talking with the government," said Kong Kwang-kyu, spokesman for the Korean Federation of Bank and Financial Labor Unions.

"We decided to postpone the strikes scheduled to begin today until we have a clearer picture of the situation." The federation, which has 114,700 members in 108 unions, belongs to the moderate Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU).

Starr subpoenas head of Clinton security

By RON FOURNIER

WASHINGTON (AP) - In a dramatic escalation of his battle with the Secret Service, Whitehouse prosecutor Kenneth Starr has subpoenaed the head of the Monica Lewinsky investigation, two US government officials yesterday.

Starr's move to compel testimony from Special Agent Larry Cockell was part of a sweeping new attempt to pierce the agency's cloak of confidentiality. At least four uniformed division officers also were subpoenaed, and Starr demanded Secret Service documents detailing Clinton's nighttime whereabouts between 1995 and 1997.

Starr and the Clinton administration are embroiled in a high-stakes court battle to determine whether Secret Service employees can be compelled to divulge what they observe while protecting the president.

Until Tuesday, Starr had been seeking testimony from two uniformed officers and a lawyer, and not any of the plainclothes agents on the president's elite personal detail.

A federal judge and a three-judge appeals court panel have sided with Starr and ordered the Secret Service testimony, but on Tuesday the Clinton administration appealed the ruling to the full US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Though the issue could be delayed for some time with additional court arguments, Starr pressed ahead with his investigation to see if Secret Service agents might have relevant information about whether the president had an affair with Lewinsky and tried to cover it up.

The subpoena to Cockell sent shock waves through the Secret Service and left officials concerned that subpoenas would be sent to other former heads of Clinton's personal detail, including Lewis Merletti, David Carpenter and Brian Stafford, one official said.

Merletti now is the director of the Secret Service.

Carpenter, a tall gray-haired agent often mistaken for Clinton, left the agency and was appointed by the president to head the State Department's security team and the office of foreign missions. He is awaiting Senate confirmation to the prestigious post, which carries the rank of ambassador.

A third government official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Tuesday night that Carpenter had not been subpoenaed and he has not talked to Starr or his office.

A legal source said at least four Secret Service uniform division officers were subpoenaed this week; their access to Clinton is much more limited than plainclothes agents.

Starr's staff advised the Justice and Treasury departments some time ago that there were additional Secret Service personnel they wanted to subpoena in the Lewinsky case, a senior Justice official said Tuesday.

This official said that Starr's staff felt that having won two court decisions - they were entitled to go ahead and deliver those subpoenas now.

One of the government officials also confirmed that Starr has subpoenaed records from the Secret Service that would detail Clinton's activities and whereabouts at night on numerous dates between 1995 and 1997. CBS News first reported the request.

Lewinsky began working at the White House as an intern in mid-1995 and transferred to the Pentagon in the spring of 1996, returning to the White House on more than three dozen occasions for visits, mostly to the Oval Office.

Secret Service officials were worried that Starr's actions might have a chilling effect on the relationship between Clinton and his immediate security detail. The president and the detail headed by Cockell will travel to Arkansas and Louisiana this weekend. The Security Service's attorneys have argued that a president will push his security team away and be more vulnerable to attack if he can't trust the agents.

Russia MPs partially approve austerity plan

By NATALIA OLYNEC and ROB URBAN

Moscow (Bloomberg) - Russia's lower house of parliament approved some parts of the government's plan to increase revenue and delayed debate on several key bills needed to meet conditions for a $22.6 billion in international loans.

The communist-dominated Duma, passed two bills in the government's program yesterday. One redistributes income from land taxes in favor of the federal government and another lowers corporate profit tax on companies which produce products such as gas, oil and electricity, at below cost. Key elements of the government program to be considered today include the third and final vote on a new tax code.

Approval of the new loans by the International Monetary Fund's board on Monday hinges on passage of the government's austerity program. President Boris Yeltsin has said he may decrease any pieces of the program that the Duma fails to pass.

"The Duma members themselves are aware of just how high the stakes are," said Sonja Gibbs, chief strategist at Nomura International in London. "The IMF would not have allowed the process to get this far without being quite certain that there would be compliance with their terms."

The Duma also approved the government's new corporate tax law in the second of three required readings. The law reduces the corporate tax to 30 percent from 35% and distributes two-thirds of the tax to the federal government and one-third to the regional government where the company is located. Anatoly Chubais, Russia's lead negotiator in the IMF talks, said he expects the Duma to approve the necessary measures including a critical change in personal income tax that would boost revenue by more than 20 billion rubles ($3.2 billion) a year - by tomorrow.

"It will probably be worked out after today and tomorrow's (Duma) session," Chubais said at a press conference. "We must have both loans and a harsh economic reform program, and right now things are working out." The government's intent is to shift the tax burden from companies to consumers to encourage economic growth, and to collect far more taxes from individuals, many of whom dodge taxes.

If the Duma doesn't finish work on the program by tomorrow, it may delay its vacation by a day and extend the session through tomorrow.

The IMF board will meet next Monday to vote on the loan, and approval will depend on Russia living up to its part of the agreement, IMF officials said. If approved, Russia would receive the first $5.6 billion installment of the loan - next week, part of $14.8 billion this year.

The promised loan, which would alleviate a cash shortage that threatened to force the government to devalue or default on its debt payments, pushed Russian stocks and bonds higher yesterday, with the benchmark RTS stock index gaining 16.83%, and the yield on the three-month Treasury bill dropping 71 percentage points to 53.73%.

Stocks rose again today, with the benchmark RTS index up 3.76% at 190.56 at the close. The Duma voted today on several bills that aren't included in the austerity program.

The Duma also approved in the second of three required votes a single tax for small businesses that's designed to increase tax collection by cutting down on tax evasion and simplifying procedures for tax payment. Under the law, small businesses will be subject to a single 20% tax to be paid in advance on estimated sales rather than to the current multitude of taxes.

The Duma passed in the final reading a law regulating the sale by the regions of debt securities.

It also adopted in a final reading a draft law on foreign investment in Russia that guarantees protection of foreign investors' rights and interests and details terms for their commercial ventures, the Interfax news agency said.

The Duma rejected in the second of three votes a proposed 5% sales tax in the regions and sent it to a committee for revision.

"Much depends on the State Duma - we are counting on the fact that a majority of the laws will be supported," said Finance Minister Mikhail Zadornov in an address to the Duma.

The loan has given us a small breathing space," Zadornov said. "With the help of the money, the central bank will support the foreign currency reserves." Facing weekly debt payments of more than $1 billion, central bank reserves have dwindled by more than $4 billion since the first of the year to $13.5 billion, including gold.

Debt payments total almost $30 billion for the rest of this year. The IMF said it still would consider approving the loan even if Yeltsin has to order promised reforms into law by decree.

Two US teens lose virginity on the net

By MARK EDAN

LOS ANGELES (Reuters) - In what is being billed as yet another first for the Internet, two 18-year-olds say they will lose their virginity on their own Web site for all the wired world to see.

The couple, calling themselves Diane and Mike, will have sex for the first time at 9 p.m. EDT on August 4, with a camera broadcasting the event free over the Internet, their lawyer Mark Vega said on Tuesday.

Vega said the plan was to "keep this as grass-roots and intimate as possible. It just takes one camera and you can invite the entire web to where you're at."

He declined to name the two or say when they live, but pictures of them with their faces blacked out have been posted on the Web site (www.ourfirsttime.com).

The site, which includes a discussion room providing net surfers a place to offer their opinions, will follow the couple's preparations.

Vega said the idea for the event was Diane's, inspired by her beliefs in freedom of speech and action. He added that she was also inspired by seeing a birth on-line last month.

But some surfers visiting the slickly-packaged site were sceptical about the couple's motives. Some posted messages suggesting they might charge money later, or take sponsorship.

Web surfers were also concerned that the couple looked too perfect and well developed to be average 18-year-olds.

Vega said the site was not about making money and that it was being funded by free speech advocates, whom he declined to name. He said no company was sponsoring the event and declined to say how much the Web site cost to construct.

Vega said that among the scheduled events would be the couple making out on-camera. He said the site will likely offer a link to another er site (www.condomania.com) but that no money would change hands for the putting the link on the site.

He said the couple were "free individuals" and so he could not rule out the possibility that they may exploit their new-found fame by selling their story but said "that's just not what this is about."

The lawyer also insisted the couple were 18 and "were virgins to the best of my knowledge."

For years people have been sharing their most intimate moments on the Internet, where taboos are few.

Last month a Florida woman gave birth to a boy in a live on-line delivery before an audience of two million people. The broadcast was billed as an educational event.

"We want to show that the act of making love, which is the first step that brought that live birth about, is just as beautiful and nothing to be ashamed about," the young couple wrote on their Web site.

An opinion poll included in the site showed 61 percent of respondents agreed with their decision to go public with their private life while 38% disagreed.

Colin Denham offered this advice: "Good luck Mike... your first time, I'd be real worried. You could be blacklisting yourself as a bad shag for life. Alternatively you might be great, but I'd stick up on Viagra just in case." The site describes the couple as recent high school graduates looking forward to college in the fall. It adds that these "typical All-American kids" are active churchgoers.

They have not yet told their parents of their plans, Vega said, adding that Diane's parents are liberal but Mike's father is a minister. The pictures of the cuddling couple on the Web site do not show their faces because "it is anticipated that there will be some religious groups and people who will try to stop Diane and Mike from completing their statement."

Vega said hackers had already attempted to dismantle the site to stop net surfers from tuning in.

Confusion reigns as deadline nears for UN war-crime court

By PAUL TAYLOR

ROME (Reuters) - Two days before a United Nations conference is due to adopt the statute of a permanent world court to try war criminals, no one knows how strong the tribunal will be, where its jurisdiction will run or even whether it will come into existence at all.

"We have reached the point of maximum confusion," a European diplomat said yesterday. "We are in the final horse-trading, and it's getting very dirty."

At issue is not just whether an International Criminal Court (ICC) will be empowered to try genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, but also who decides what cases are investigated and who has to consent to a prosecution.

Human rights groups say proposals backed by the US and France would mean that dictators would have to give their permission to their own prosecution.

"Apply that to the real world and no Pol Pots or Saddam Husseins will ever come before this court," said Richard Dicker, spokesman for Human Rights Watch.

There are still wild-card issues that could trip up the conference, such as India's insistence that the use of nuclear weapons be declared a war crime, demands by Turkey, Sri Lanka, India and others for terrorism and drug crimes to be added, and the Non-Aligned Movement's call for the statute to eventually include the crime of aggression.

Diplomats said France, the only European Union state that wants tighter limits on the court, was even floating the idea of adjourning the conference rather than see it collapse or reach an unacceptable conclusion.

The US, which has the most widely deployed troops overseas, has used extraordinary arm-twisting on its own closest allies into accepting tight limits on the court's powers that would guarantee that no US soldier could ever face indictment.

Washington warned both Germany and North Korea - two of the proponents of the farthest reaching powers for the court - that it would reconsider its overseas troop commitment in Europe and East Asia if their ideas were adopted, diplomats said.

Despite Pentagon denials, US Defense Secretary William Cohen not only raised that prospect with his German and South Korean counterparts, but the Defense Department then faxed his talking points to their ministries to underline the message.

"They are using the heavy steamroller, threatening allies on troops, using aid as a lever with certain developing countries," a neutral diplomat said.

While Germany has stood firm and resisted all efforts to prevent the ICC having automatic jurisdiction over all three core crimes, the South Koreans are feeling the heat.

"We have between 95 and 99 percent of the statute already agreed," a European Union diplomat said. "We have achieved unprecedented progress on all sorts of issues that would have been unthinkable a few years ago. The United Nations has spent $100 million on this conference and got this close. It would be absurd and out of this world not to conclude now."

Lesser US pressure has been applied in the last few days on many of the so-called "like-minded states" which want a strong court with an independent prosecutor, including Canada, the Netherlands, Senegal and several Latin American states, diplomats and human rights groups reported.

But they appear to be holding firm and seem determined to launch the court even if the Americans refuse to sign.

The return of Richard Holbrooke

By MARK MATTHEWS

WASHINGTON — A few years ago, Richard Holbrooke's dominant, even overbearing, personality got him cut out of the center of power. Now it's dealing him back in.

In 1995, when he was the State Department official responsible for Europe, Holbrooke found himself excluded from key strategy sessions intended to end the war in Bosnia, at least in part because of his abrasive style.

But once the course was set, Holbrooke became the point man, pressing and pummeling the Bosnian Moslems, Serbs and Croats into a deal — the Dayton Accords — that ended the worst ethnic violence in Europe since World War II and finally won respect for President Clinton's international leadership.

Now, Holbrooke's powerful persona and penchant for the spotlight are in demand again, this time to rebuild American influence at the United Nations. Tapped by Clinton as ambassador to the world body, Holbrooke, 57, is expected also to raise the UN's profile with members of Congress and the American public at a time when it is under sharp assault.

Moreover, the job carries Cabinet rank, giving Holbrooke a leg up to become secretary of state if Al Gore is elected president in 2000.

Questions persist, however, about Holbrooke's willingness to serve as a team player. His shouting matches and tendency to try to dominate meetings are legendary.

"The UN is a global platform that gives an activist individual a lot of room to play," says John Bolton, a former assistant secretary of state in charge of international organizations. "That can cause problems for a secretary of state." Madeleine K. Albright, who bested Holbrooke in the competition to become Clinton's second-term secretary of state, welcomes him to the table as an activist soulmate who believes in the idea of diplomacy backed by force. But she has noted pointedly that Holbrooke will be working for her and urged him privately to avoid public statements that conflict with the State Department line.

The rough-and-tumble, head-knocking skills he displayed at Dayton don't fit the UN, says a high-ranking US diplomat.

"The UN environment is one of building consensus," this diplomat said. "It requires enormous tact and subtlety." Holbrooke's magic failed him in two recent diplomatic forays — to dampen the ongoing crisis between Greek and Turkish Cypriots and to end a new wave of Balkan fighting, this time in the volatile Serbian province of Kosovo.

His heavy reliance on the pragmatism of Yugoslavia's president, Slobodan Milosevic, has invited complaints that Holbrooke has played down Milosevic's role as the man who inspired the murderous Serbian aggression. Holbrooke says he works with Milosevic because the Yugoslav leader can deliver.

Richard Holbrooke runs through pouring rain to talk with local leaders in Pristina earlier this month. After suffering setbacks, the veteran diplomat's powerful persona and penchant for the spotlight are in demand again.

"Holbrooke made Milosevic his partner at Dayton, but that was after NATO force had backed US diplomacy," said John Fox, who heads the Washington office of the Open Society Institute, funded by philanthropist George Soros. "Now we have Holbrooke and Milosevic without NATO — there's a big difference." Holbrooke's allies note that he is just one of several US diplomats seeking a Kosovo solution, and insist that NATO is ready to act if called upon.

Holbrooke learned a bitter lesson in diplomatic timing in 1968, when, as a 26-year-old foreign service officer, he joined the Paris team headed by W. Averell Harriman and Cyrus Vance seeking a negotiated end to the Vietnam War.

Despite repeated urging by his negotiators, President Lyndon B. Johnson waited until the week before the 1968 presidential election to stop the bombing of North Vietnam. No peace agreement was reached.

Holbrooke's own chance to end a war came three decades later, long after his years as Peace Corps director in Morocco, managing editor of the journal Foreign Policy, his first political appointment as an assistant secretary of state for East Asia in the Carter administration and a lucrative career as a New York investment banker.

After seeing the Bosnian war firsthand on visits in 1992, Holbrooke hoped to broker peace there after Clinton's election.

Instead he became ambassador to Germany, where he performed with panache, and oversaw Clinton's successful 1994 visit to Berlin. "I think he is one of the most effective guns in the American arsenal," says Josef Joffe, editorial-page editor of the German newspaper Sueddeutsche Zeitung. "He's an asset of strength in American diplomacy."

Summoned to Washington as assistant secretary of state for European Affairs in 1994, Holbrooke lobbied unsuccessfully for greater force by NATO as leverage against Bosnian Serb aggression. The next summer, he talked about quitting. "As the administration deliberated, the Bosnian Serbs attacked," Holbrooke writes in his memoir, To End a War. "It took a massacre of thousands of Moslems in Srebrenica — 'the biggest single mass murder in Europe since World War II' — to galvanize the United States and its allies into a determined effort to end the war."

His book lavishes praise on a number of colleagues, including some with whom he is likely to work in the future. Holbrooke describes Gore's top national security adviser, Leon Fuerth, as "one of those powerful but rarely seen people who play major roles behind the scene in Washington."

But Holbrooke left a bad taste in the mouths of some White House officials by resigning in early 1996 to join his new wife in New York and resume a high-paying investment-banking career, leaving the complex and crucial task of carrying out the Dayton accords to State Department subordinates. Without his leadership, a year was lost, during which the fragile peace almost came undone.

However, Holbrooke supporters say he made his plans to leave office known well in advance and that others should have been able to follow through on Dayton. Holbrooke declined an interview request, saying he would not contribute to profile articles while awaiting Senate confirmation. (Baltimore Sun)

Forcing history's hand

TO END A WAR by Richard Holbrooke. New York: Random House, 407 pp. $27.95.

By Shimshon Arad

For students of history, as for those engaged in directing or in practicing diplomacy, Richard Holbrooke's book on his involvement in the Bosnian war is a most revealing and instructive document. We tend to forget that between 1991 and 1995, close to 300,000 people were killed in the former Yugoslavia. The international response to this catastrophe was "at best uncertain and at worst appalling." While both the US and the European Union initially considered the Balkan wars as "a European problem," the Europeans chose not to take a strong stand, restricting themselves to dispatching UN "peacekeepers" to a country where there was no peace to keep.

Holbrooke's account was written from the perspective of an active participant. He began his diplomatic career in Vietnam in 1962 when he was 21. At the age of 36 he was nominated assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. For over a year he served as ambassador in Germany, and returned to Washington in 1994 to become assistant secretary of state for European affairs. It was in that post that he was assigned to cope with the Bosnian conflict, leading to Dayton, where for 21 days he led a brilliant intensive-care operation on the presidents of Serbia, Croatia and Bosnia, culminating in a peace agreement and the cessation of hostilities.

The crux of Holbrooke's account is the dramatic story of how one forces a historic course on a situation that might otherwise have deteriorated to abyss, death and misery. Sitting on the fence was not only a European propensity. It was also the preferred track for many American politicians and diplomats and the military. Bringing Washington to assume a more active role in Bosnia through synchronized diplomatic and military measures was Holbrooke's major achievement. He would not have managed to do that had he not been backed by the key players in the Clinton administration. But only with the initiative and stamina of a seasoned workhorse, only with the confidence and support of the president and of Warren Christopher, could Holbrooke pull this off.

Overcoming the internal American bickering, soothing inflated French egos and Italian jealousy, and cultivating senior

Richard Holbrooke

(Rosemarie Pauli)

UN officials, would not have produced the tenuous Dayton agreement if the Russians had maintained a hostile stance to the Bosnian deal. In the end, not only did the Russians moderate their suspicions but they even gave their consent to the unprecedented deployment of Russian troops in Bosnia under American command as part of a "NATO-led peacekeeping force."

Referring to an article he published early in 1995 in Foreign Affairs, Holbrooke cites his judgment that Yugoslavia was "the greatest collective security failure of the West since the 1930s." In the book he says that Yugoslavia represents a failure of historic dimensions and asks why and how it happened. Just at the moment of the West's great triumph over Communism. He then suggests five major factors that help explain the tragedy. Of the five, the end of the Cold War and the behavior of the Yugoslav leaders themselves coupled, as it were, with the inadequate American response, determined the fate of Yugoslavia.

Of the three Balkan leaders - Milosevic of Serbia, Tudjman of Croatia, and Izetbegovic of Bosnia-Herzegovina - the toughest was Milosevic. He was smart, charming and evasive. Despite his cleverness, he was "playing word games devoid of substance." The essential goal for Milosevic was to get the sanctions lifted at no cost. Knowing that obviously gave the Americans the necessary lever to persuade the Serbian president to play ball.

Doing business with Tudjman was somewhat easier, especially following the reaching of the Bosnian-Croat understanding. Izetbegovic appears to be a very complex but interesting person. He is a devout Muslim, although not the Bosnian syncretist. Although he paid lip service to the principles of a multicultural state, "he was not the democrat that some supporters in the West saw." The most exasperating experiences with him were caused by his repeated inability to stick to and honor agreements. Almost in every phase, his foreign minister or his prime minister would disavow agreements earlier reached. It therefore required a firm stand and sometimes an ultimatum to force Izetbegovic to keep his commitments. The same irritating tactics continued all through the Dayton negotiations; and more than once, the help of Christopher and Clinton had to be enlisted in order to get the Bosnians to be reasonable.

The refusal of the Bush administration to commit American power early in the Bosnian crisis contributed considerably to Milosevic's tough stand and to the low esteem of the West. Secretary of state James Baker, who showed leadership and courage in the Middle East, failed terribly in the Balkan case. He said at the time: "We don't have a dog in this fight." The CNN pictures of death and the destruction of Sarajevo, the horrible stories of "cleansing" operations by the Serbs and the Croats, and the tragic death of three senior US officials in Bosnia shifted sentiment and crystallized involvement subsequently.

Two international officials are singled out by Holbrooke as the ones who at the right moment had the guts to take a bold decision and authorize the effective and sustained bombing of Serbian positions in Bosnia, thus facilitating the diplomatic breakthrough with Milosevic. They are Kofi Annan, who was then in charge of UN peacekeeping operations, and Willy Claes, who was at the time NATO's secretary-general.

Boutros-Ghali, the UN secretary-general at the time, failed to demonstrate the boldness required under fire. That was the main reason for the US's opposition to his reelection, while Kofi Annan's fortitude in authorizing the bombing won him the job as secretary-general of the UN. Holbrooke maintains that had it not been for Claes's firm stand, the Europeans would have blocked or minimized the bombing and thereby weakened the leverage necessary for breaking the impasse.

Using military force to achieve diplomatic breakthrough was not invented by Holbrooke, but he applied this mechanism very aptly. Once the US showed a firm policy, Milosevic had no chance of removing the hateful sanctions without making the adequate concessions to achieve peace. The overall coordination of policy in Washington was quite impressive, but there were many faults and failures in the process. Holbrooke pays the highest praise to the constructive contribution of Christopher in the Bosnian crisis. Those who were not always impressed by his performance in the Middle East during his last six months in office, might be surprised to find these generous comments on his role in the Balkans.

The Dayton agreement shook the leadership elite of post-Cold War Europe. The Europeans were grateful to the US for leading the effort that finally ended the war in Bosnia, but some Europeans were embarrassed that American involvement had been necessary. On paper, sums up the author, Dayton was a good agreement - it terminated the war and established a single, multiethnic country. But a short time later, the passive policy of the NATO command, including the American generals, and their reluctance to enforce decisively all the clauses of the agreement, encouraged those Serbs - like Karadzic and General Mladic - who hated Dayton, to start again with their nefarious acts. Measures had to be taken once again to force Milosevic to stop these acts of savagery.

The book ends before the new-old Kosovo flashpoint emerged. Holbrooke was called back from his Wall Street retirement to go to Belgrade and try to settle the conflict.

He has recently been nominated US ambassador to the UN, which will ensure his being at the center of American diplomacy, and not only in the Balkans.

Cahill's 'Gifts' honors Judaism

By Mary Rourke

Talking to a stranger in an Irish pub, Thomas Cahill learned to keep quiet about books he has in the works.

"What do you do?" he asked the man beside him.

"I'm a writer."

"What have you written?"

"I haven't written anything."

Cahill told the story to a gathering at a bookstore in Los Angeles who asked about his own plans for a series of books he has in the works. His latest, The Gifts of the Jews (Doubleday), is the second in the set called "Hinges of History." The first was How the Irish Saved Civilization (Doubleday, 1995), which makes it hard to predict the next logical step.

As invitations to speak fill Cahill's calendar, most of them from Jewish community centers around the US, there's this other question to ask: Why would a book about Judaism written by an Irish Catholic appeal to Jews?

"Unalloyed admiration," he guesses. "The Jews," he writes, "were the first people to find a new way of thinking and experiencing, a new way of understanding and feeling the world, so much so that it may be said with some justice that theirs is the only new idea human beings have ever had."

He does, though, have other credentials. Cahill was director of religious publishing for Doubleday in the 1980s. Before he wrote The Gifts of the Jews, he studied Scripture at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, where he lives, went to the deserts of the Middle East to walk through the beginnings of Jewish history and learned Hebrew so he could read the Bible in that language.

Was his hair as silver before all of that? He says he "busted a gasket" studying Hebrew and found that brute memorization was easier when he was 17 than now in his mid-50s.

But none of it was wasted energy. Like the dinner partner who makes you feel you are the most fascinating person at the table, he has twisted brains, wit, charm, scholar's muscles and traveler's memories toward his subject with undivided attention.

"I tried for several years to live with the people of the Bible," he says. "Finally, I could see Abraham's tent in the desert heat."

The gifts, he decided, come down to two: The Jews were the first in human history to claim individual freedom, and to presume that they could make the future better than the past. "There is a direct link between the ancient Jews and the American Declaration of Independence," Cahill says.

Abraham, father of the clan, took the first step toward independence when he answered a voice he heard in the desert, telling him to leave his home and go where he would be led. He asked who was speaking and heard, "Yahweh," one of several Hebrew names for God.

Until that night, Abraham was like everybody else in ancient Mesopotamia who saw things as predictable and out of control. "Life was a wheel, and there was no escape," Cahill says. "You were born fated. Nothing new was supposed to happen. But this one little desert tribe decided not to see life that way."

After his conversation with God, things changed for Abraham and his descendants. He fathered two sons in his 90s, and his wife, Sarah, was almost as old when she attracted an amorous king. A city exploded in fire before his eyes, a nephew's wife turned to a pillar of salt, a grandson wrestled with an angel all night, an army drowned in the sea chasing his followers.

Thomas Cahill

Things went on like that for centuries. "A new notion of time changed Abraham," Cahill says. "Time became real because the future became real, and unpredictable. Since then in the West we don't believe everything is fated. We make our own fate."

"Once you've been there, you can't go back to a cyclical view of the world. You aren't part of a wheel, you are an individual. A human life has value."

Maybe life is easier when everything seems inevitable. "You can be at peace if you believe this is all supposed to happen," Cahill suggests. "We have much more trouble in the West because we don't believe it. That's why we have violence. People on the bottom think things can be better, and a lot of our conflicts are a result of it."

To see life as a procession, not a circle, was like bracing a turbine to Jewish history. "A sense of time and individuality produces a sense of accomplishment," Cahill says. "We can safely say the Jews have won that derby." Thirty percent of Nobel Prize winners are Jews, who account for one-quarter of one percent of the world's population, Cahill notes.

His book is a cultural history more than a study of how the Bible was made, but Cahill does refer to the views of progressive Scripture scholars.

He describes the Book of Ruth, about a friendship between two women, as one probably written by a woman, and says the first 50 Psalms are probably by King David, Israel's second king. He writes about "mah-nu," translated as "bread," in no romantic terms.

"It was probably white edible insect secretions to be found on the branches of some rare Sinai plants," he explains of the food the Israelites lived on as they walked across the desert.

"Most of what I wrote is a consensus of contemporary Scripture scholars," he says. "The trouble is that no one [else] gets to read about it. Scholars talk to one another, not other people."

As a Christian learning to read the Bible like a Jew, Cahill discovered a new way of looking at the book.

"For Jews, the Bible is the family document," he says. "They read with a sense of authority. I don't think Christians have ever been as comfortable with it."

"Protestants and Catholics want to take up a section, get an answer to the question, 'What does this mean?' and move on. They are unwilling to live with the ambiguities that Scripture contains."

While he was studying Jewish history, he studied publishing trends to figure out the secret to successful sales. "People's interest in religion is constant, but their way of expressing it changes," he says. "Until the '60s, Jews read religious books by Jews. Catholics read Catholics. Now, it's no longer denominational."

His best teacher was M. Scott Peck, whose spiritual self-help book, The Road Less Traveled, published in 1978, was a bestseller for more than 10 years. "It was the great religious publishing phenomenon of the last decade because it combined religion and psychology," he says.

"I tried to combine modern psychology with ancient spirituality." (Los Angeles Times)

Denise Giardina, 46, spent her first 13 years in Black Wolf, a ten-hour coal camp in southern West Virginia. As a girl she read mostly historical fiction and Shakespeare, and heard coal miners' stories about the "land and their work underground." Her first novel, Storming Heaven, and The Unquiet Earth, were firmly grounded in the Appalachian Mountains, and Good King Harry was a historical novel based on Henry V. So how did Giardina come to write a novel about the life of German theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer, who was hanged in 1945 for his part in a plot to resist Hitler?

After completing a degree in history at Wesleyan College in 1973, Giardina drifted from job to job and place to place until she found her home in the Episcopal Church, where she was ordained a deacon in 1979. Around that time, she was given a book of Bonhoeffer's writings. Over the next 20 years she became obsessed with the question of "how people of conscience deal with compromises they have to make." Saints and Villains (Norton) is the first novel Giardina has written in the third person. She also shifts from past tense to present tense in the final scenes to amplify the suspense created by the advancing Allied forces during Bonhoeffer's last days. And she has adopted a straightforward voice: "I wanted to write a book a coal miner could read. Just 'cause it's accessible doesn't mean it hasn't got depth. I wanted the story itself to carry the depth, rather than the density of the language."

STEVEN SPIELBERG and his media company DreamWorks will combine with Penguin in a multi-million dollar deal to produce a 21 classic animated films with tie-in books for children. Among the high-profile authors participating in the project are Lynne Reid Banks, Madeleine L'Engle and Jane Yolen. The first title to be released will be The Prince of Egypt, a retelling of the story of Moses. The Ants, with Woody Allen doing the voice-over of an ant who wants to be different, and Eldorado, about two scoundrels in a quest for the legendary city of gold, are set to follow.

DARCY O'BRIEN's last book was The Hidden Pope: The Untold Story of a Lifelong Friendship between Catholics and Jews: The Personal Journey of John Paul II and Jerry Kluger (Daybreak). O'Brien, 39, died of a heart attack in March on the eve of the book's publication. The book outlines how the Pope and Kluger forged diplomatic ties between the Vatican and Israel.

THE DATE for the 19th Biennial Jerusalem International Book Fair has been set for 20-25 June, 1999 - a later date than usual in order not to clash with other international fairs. The theme of next year's fair is "Books That Changed the 20th Century."

WINN SCHWARTAU, computer security expert and writer of the first cyber novel (available only on the Internet at www.infowar.com), has given talks at dozens of high security US military installations. He recalls: "In one super-classified building that doesn't officially exist, two armed guards were assigned to me with the edict, 'if he gets within twenty feet of a computer, shoot.' Damn good thing the men's room used manual flushers!"

An unhealthy proposal

A tax, according to Oxford's, is a contribution levied on persons, property or businesses for support of public services, either directly or indirectly.

Thus, a payment levied on residents on a monthly basis, or for visits to doctors or hospital outpatient clinics is a tax — even if Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Finance Minister Yaakov Neeman decline to call it that.

The government has doggedly refused to recognize these "co-payments" as a tax because it committed itself, in George Bush's "read my lips" style, not to raise taxes.

But with the burgeoning NIS 1.4 billion deficit in the national health insurance system, and the imminent collapse of the four public health funds unless they're bailed out, a Rube Goldberg-like contraption was dreamed up by the Treasury, and timidly supported by Health Minister Yehoshua Matza, who had initially (and, behind closed doors, vocally) opposed the scheme.

The deficit was accumulated in part by hefty wage increases granted to health workers by the Labor government, and the failure of both Labor and Likud finance and health ministers to prevent the health funds from going on a wild spending spree — building luxurious new facilities everywhere and hiring contractors to lure members with presents and false promises.

Finance Ministry officials undoubtedly sighed in relief yesterday, when the Knesset Finance Committee voted by a meager eight-to-seven margin in favor of the co-payment plan. It's not over yet: Opponents will get a re-vote on Monday, and one would hope that committee members will sober up and give the whole issue more serious consideration.

But as it stands now, as of September 1, all residents — who already pay 4.8% of their gross monthly income on health taxes, plus more for supplementary health insurance, dental care, medications, geriatric nursing care and private medicine — will have to pay their health fund an extra fee each month, whether they require medical care or not.

In addition, those unfortunate enough to be sick would have to pay user taxes for visits to community clinic doctors, hospital clinics and physiotherapists.

This is exactly what was abolished by the national health insurance system, which in 1995 established an equitable and progressive tax framework in which everybody, well or sick, gets a basic basket of health services in return for a progressive tax on income.

Under the co-payment scheme, every adult would be charged NIS 20 a month by the health fund, plus NIS 5 for each of the first three children, for a maximum household payment of NIS 55. Exactly how this would be collected is unclear, as not everyone has a standing order with the bank to pay their health fund supplementary insurance fees.

The poor, the chronically ill and large families would get partial exemptions. This means that Kupat Holim Clalit, which will have the most exempt members, can be expected to demand compensation from the government or do all it could to discourage needy people from remaining as members.

There would also be a NIS 10 to NIS 20 fee per quarter for visits to each health fund doctor, and a NIS 20 charge for going to a hospital outpatient clinic. This, the government claims, would discourage "unnecessary" medical consultations and "promote a stronger bond" between the patient and his primary physician.

This scheme is ridden with holes. In the future, when deficits inevitably grow, the government is sure to pressure the Finance Committee to allow more and higher co-payments — in effect, abrogating the National Health Insurance Law. Thousands of families not granted exemptions are likely to demand inclusion on the basis of their personal situations, overwhelming the health funds' appeals apparatus and, in turn, the Health Ministry's overworked ombudsman's office.

With violence against medical staffers already common in emergency rooms and clinics, demands for extra payments will make the atmosphere more tense. The health funds readily admit that they haven't a clue how fund and hospital doctors will know when each family has reached its quarterly "ceiling." And if it were possible to program this into the computer systems, who would ensure privacy so that a patient's doctor would not know how many and which doctors the patient's spouse or children had seen that quarter? Such an act would clearly violate the Patients' Rights Law.

And how will the ceiling be determined if family members belong to different health funds? It is also unclear how the insurers will respond if members simply refuse to make the co-payments. Can they refuse to give medical treatment?

Even some senior Health Ministry officials privately call the Treasury scheme "unworkable" and "a disaster." The committee must realize this and consider other avenues for covering the health funds' shortfall, possibly by a major increase in tobacco taxes (polls have shown that even smokers would prefer paying more for cigarettes than making co-payments for medical care), or by instituting lower health tax rates for non-smokers. In any case, the cobble-together plan should be dumped when the committee reconvenes next week.

Outrageous accusations

A cynical campaign to smear the good name of the judge who presided over the trial of Israel's most notorious traitor, Nahum Manbar, as well as a young female lawyer who was attested to him, has hit the lowest point of any judicial action in Israeli legal history. His effort to create a "Strashnov Affair" has backfired and is now known in legal and political circles as the "Zichroni Affair."

In a bid to have Tel Aviv District Court Judge Amnon Strashnov barred from passing sentence on Manbar, his defense lawyer, Amnon Zichroni, claimed he had tapes and other evidence to prove that Strashnov's attested lawyer, Pinat Yanai, was involved in a sexual relationship with him.

Manbar's wife also claimed to have incriminating taped evidence against Yanai.

When Zichroni made his accusations public, Yanai responded immediately: "The accusation is an abominable act. I never had sex with Strashnov. After I completed my period of apprenticeship with him, Amnon Zichroni hired me. It was only after a while that I realized his motive was to try and pick my brains to find out what he could use in his defense of Manbar."

So solid was the proof of Manbar's activities that his defense team had to descend to diversionary tricks to try and help him. In a bid to make it a major political issue, Zichroni also claimed that both Benjamin Netanyahu and his spokesman, Shai Bazak, had interfered in Manbar's trial. This was hotly denied.

It was Manbar's wife, Francine, who gave an indication of the money which was poured into the pockets of the defense team. She admitted that she had sold a villa in Lugano for $800,000 to help save her husband.

But that was comparative small change, for Manbar was paid $16 million for delivering 24 truckloads of deadly weaponry to Iran. As Strashnov put it when passing judgment: "He sacrificed the security of Israel and its well-being on the altar of his unrestrained greed."

So solid was the proof of Manbar's activities that his defense team had to descend to diversionary tricks to try and help him

WHAT happened to Manbar, who is a former kibbutznik and IDF paratrooper?

He wanted more from life than returning to his kibbutz and growing tomatoes. He was attracted by the bright lights of the world of jet-setters and their magnificent villas on the French Riviera. That is precisely where he met Francine, either by design or chance.

She was the widow of a German who was one of the shady arms dealers selling sophisticated weapons of mass destruction to Arab countries. The couple married. Manbar had stepped into Francine's ex-husband's shoes as well as her bed by deciding that the sale of weapons to Iran would give him the lifestyle he craved.

For five years, the Israeli intelligence worked ceaselessly to track Manbar's operations. Because of his friendship with many left-wing politicians, the security services had to tread very delicately and carefully.

With mastery skill Manbar built the perfect cover by bringing his wife to Tel Aviv to brief Israeli security officials about her former husband's deals. Who could possibly guess that he was doing the same thing?

He befriended a wide variety of Labor politicians, including Uzi Baram and Dalia Izlik. He threw extravagant parties in the south of France. He nudged his way into the close circle around Yitzhak Rabin both before and after he became prime minister. Leah Rabin was a guest at his stylish villa.

He hailed the Oslo Accords as a great achievement. No wonder that he became the Labor Party's darling sugar daddy.

Amnon Zichroni was the Aviv Geffen of his youth. He refused to serve alongside his childhood friends in the Israeli army in the 1950s, making his stand on being pacifist. Certainly there is nothing of the pacifist in his smear campaign this week.

Even the security service operative "Nir" was named as being romantically connected with Yanai. If there was any proof of her alleged liaisons, one wonders how she could have found the time to carry out her work in court.

Yet there is no evidence at all of all these bedroom activities.

In short: To smear an innocent young lawyer and to stain her character with sexual innuendo is outrageous. And so is the unsubstantiated barrage of accusations flung in all directions by Zichroni without providing any firm evidence to back his claims.

The View From the East

DAOD KUTTAB

Answer the question

The United States' government, unable and unwilling to press Israel to move ahead with the peace process, is now suggesting that the parties meet and resolve the differences between them. This is a big mistake.

Normally such a call would make a lot of sense. After all, parties intending to make peace must talk. For years, Israeli leaders demanded direct bilateral talks with the leaders of Arab countries (they didn't want to talk to Palestinians). Now, after Madrid and Oslo, thousands of hours of meetings have taken place between Israeli and Arab leaders — with little progress.

If the parties meet in a spirit of goodwill and with a genuine intention of resolving the conflict, such meetings would be welcome. But when these meetings become the goal rather than the means to achieving peace, they become counterproductive. Meetings whose only purpose is a photo opportunity send out the false signal that everything is OK, when in fact it is not.

Nearly six months ago, I interviewed the US consul-general in Jerusalem, John Herbst, about the peace process. At that time, the Clinton administration was trying to convince both Palestinians and Israelis to accept a compromise proposal to move the peace process ahead.

After the formal interview was over, Herbst asked if I thought the Palestinians would accept the US plan, which called for a second redeployment of only 13 percent from Palestinian territories. (The Palestinian Authority had been expecting a 30% partial pullback, in accordance with the Oslo Agreement.)

I told him that I believed Yasser Arafat would agree if it were implemented as is, without any further concessions on the Palestinian side.

Ironically, this American plan which has been awaiting an Israeli response for months was, in fact, tailor-made to fit Israeli requests. The US proposal is based on the concept of reciprocity as conceived by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

It is a step-by-step process in which each side has to carry out certain obligations before the other side carries out their commitments. The Palestinian concern turned out to be legitimate. While the Palestinians have accepted the US plan, Netanyahu has not. Instead, he is trying to blame the Palestinians and demand further concessions.

THE US has left the people of the region hanging. We were promised resolve and action, but all we see is hesitation and inaction. President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright have warned, more than once, they will announce the full text of their plan and also declare which party is responsible for its failure. But every time the US is about to publish its peace plan, the Israelis and their supporters in Congress pressure the Clinton administration and nothing happens. At best, US envoy Dennis Ross is sent over here.

Now Albright seems to be abandoning the US compromise plan and is calling on the parties to negotiate directly. This is a cop-out.

Israel has flouted the international community. It uses the power it has on the ground in occupied Palestine to make its own demands and ignore international law. The suggestion that by simply having Israelis and Palestinians meet problems will be resolved is far-fetched.

Shortly after the 1991 Madrid Conference, former premier Yitzhak Shamir said he intended to drag on those talks with the Palestinians for 10 years. At that conference, Netanyahu was the Israeli spokesman. Like his ex-boss, Netanyahu, without concerting with the Palestinians, sending false signals that an agreement is just around the corner.

For a PR person like Netanyahu, meetings are a great opportunity to look good without making the hard decisions. He still seems to think that he is the Israeli government's spokesman, not its prime minister.

Netanyahu seems unwilling to respect the will of the international community and reverse the injustice Israel metes out daily to Palestinians any more than Slobodan Milosevic will cease his genocidal policies in the face of international criticism. For the present Israeli rulers, like their Serbian counterparts, right is not right, only might is right.

The US and the world community must find a way to get the Israelis to answer the questions they have been asked. A meeting with the Palestinians will not help answer the question the world has been asking of Israel.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PRESERVE JEWISH UNITY

Sir, — In a full page ad (June 26), the spiritual leaders of American Reform and Conservative branches of Judaism demand a full legal partnership with the Orthodox chief rabbis in formulating Jewish conversions in Israel in the name of Jewish unity and compromise.

In order to preserve the unity of the Jewish people in Israel from the fate of the "vanishing American Jew," where 50 percent to 60 percent of marriages are with non-Jewish mates, Israel's chief rabbis have wisely insisted on the age-old Jewish family laws that require more than token acceptance in Jewish conversion. Because of the complete separation of religion and state in the US, there is no power of enforcement to implement unified religious standards of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform for marriage, divorce and conversion so that born Jews often find it impossible to marry one another.

In Israel, where since the British Mandate, the chief rabbis are in full charge of marriage, divorce and conversion, the Jewish community has remained strong with powers of enforcement by the government.

Because we enjoy a Jewish government in Israel, we should avoid the unnecessary tensions endemic in the lands of the Diaspora. Ben-Gurion and many of the founding fathers who were secular Jews knew that only Orthodox Jewish family laws could preserve us as one nation, and one family.

Those who paved the way for the "disappearing American Jew" are now joining the "New Middle East" Jews who are endangering the future physical and spiritual strength of "Eternal Israel" for political advantage.

COME INTO THE 20TH CENTURY

Sir, — As is often the case, writers who have a strong ideological leaning often skew the facts to fit their agenda. Such is the case with Jonathan Rosenblum's June 27 column, in which he makes the totally unsubstantiated — and just plain wrong — statement that there is abundant evidence that, for teenagers whose sexual identity is in flux, TV shows that portray teenage homosexuality positively will increase the incidence of homosexuality. Such drivel is what one would hear in the Middle Ages, or in Mr. Rosenblum's yeshiva; not in the halls of academia or modern medical teaching.

It is becoming increasingly clear to all in the field that homosexuality is predestined at birth, that the person has no control over it, and that denying it is more harmful than accepting the reality of it — as hard as it is to do in the cultural milieu that casts such scorn upon it, like Mr. Rosenblum's.

Come on, Mr. Rosenblum, come into the 20th century! Wake up to the reality that much has been learned about life since the Talmud, Mishna, and Gemara were codified. Learning does not stop with them; it continues on.

MORE THAN CURIOUS

Sir, — So Ziv Chen said that Pinat Yanai said that Shai Bazak said that the prime minister spoke to Judge Strashnov about the Manbar case. Not much in the way of evidence, I would say. It's even flimsier than the case of Roni Bar-On. Though why the Labor Party politicians want to dirty their hands on Manbar is more than curious.

And as long as we are comparing, Hana'el Forat says that in a case such as this, either the prime minister is lying or someone else is and either way, someone must be made to "pay the price." We heard the same thing in the Bar-On case, and although the PM was cleared, no one paid any price. Does anyone really think it will be different this time?

65 years ago: On July 16, 1933, The Palestine Post reported that the government refused to publish the late Dr. Chaim Arlosoroff's report made on behalf of the Jewish Agency and an independent research project by French experts since both refuted Arab fears and proved that sufficient lands could be found and developed for both Jews and Arabs in the country.

50 years ago: On July 16, 1948, The Palestine Post reported that a Palestine truce move was adopted by eight votes to one, with two abstentions in UN Security Council. This was the first time in UN history that Chapter VII, with its sanctions clauses, had been invoked. Israeli forces advanced on all fronts and Cairo was bombed by the Israeli Air Force for the first time.

25 years ago: On July 16, 1973, The Jerusalem Post reported that the army service had been cut to 33 months since the war fronts were less active, and the air force was believed to be a stronger deterrent.

The case for the egg

By DOROTHY FOLTZ-GRAY and LINDA WEST ECKHARDT

For too many years, eggs took a beating. Turns out they're not the nutritional bad guys after all.

Back in the 1970s, as we naively enjoyed our omelets, custards, and quiches, researchers began uncovering troubling links between diet and disease. The deeper they delved, the louder their cries grew about the link between saturated fat and cholesterol and the risk of heart disease. Suddenly, the cholesterol-rich egg was a dietary hoodlum.

Two decades later, however, more and more studies are revealing that for most people, fears about eggs have been exaggerated.

"Most everyone will agree that the earlier sole focus on reducing the intake of dietary cholesterol, and particularly eggs, was misplaced," says Robert Nicolosi, PhD, director of the Center for Cardiovascular Disease Control at the University of Massachusetts-Lowell. "Even those who still argue that eggs need to be limited, agree that saturated fat, not dietary cholesterol, has the major impact on blood-cholesterol levels."

More important, scientists have confirmed in humans what they observed in animal studies decades ago: Response to dietary cholesterol is highly individual. Many scientists believe how you respond to cholesterol is genetically determined. If a relative died of heart disease and your blood cholesterol is more than 200, for example, a cheese-filled omelet may not be your best daily breakfast choice.

Because an easy test for cholesterol sensitivity doesn't exist yet, the American Heart Association still urges restraint with eggs and other cholesterol-rich foods.

"We know that dietary cholesterol is related to the risk of heart attack, independent of blood-cholesterol levels," says Ronald Krauss, MD, chairman of the AHA's nutrition committee and head of the department of molecular medicine at the University of California-Berkeley. "A portion of dietary cholesterol winds up in the arteries." (A single egg contains about 215 milligrams of cholesterol, which is two-thirds of the 300 mg. daily limit that the AHA recommends.)

Even so, no one — including Krauss — is suggesting that you go egg-less, unless you're particularly sensitive to dietary cholesterol.

"The AHA has always said that eggs can be a part of a healthy diet," he says.

In fact, its guidelines allow up to four eggs a week. The reasons are simple: Eggs are "a perfectly nutritious food," Krauss says. At only 70 calories a pop, they're an almost ideal low-fat source of protein. Each egg has about 4.5 grams of fat, of which only one-quarter is saturated — about the same amount as a cup of 1 percent milk. Eggs also are inexpensive and contain modest amounts of riboflavin, iron, calcium, phosphorus, zinc, and vitamins A, B6, and B12.

So lighten up and enjoy an occasional soufflé, omelet, or quiche. Most people can savor those foods and still stay within the AHA guidelines, especially if they watch what they pair with their eggs.

Preheat oven to 205°. Cut a piece of foil long enough to fit around a 1 1/2-liter souffle dish, allowing a 2.5cm. overlap; fold foil lengthwise into thirds. Lightly coat one side of foil and bottom of dish with cooking spray. Wrap foil around outside of dish, coated side against dish, allowing it to extend 10cm. above the rim to form a collar; secure with string or masking tape.

Combine eggplant, oil and garlic in a bowl; toss gently to coat. Place eggplant mixture on a jelly-roll pan coated with cooking spray, spreading evenly. Bake at 205° for 30 minutes.

Place flour in a medium-sized saucepan. Gradually add milk, stirring with a whisk until well-blended. Bring to a boil over medium heat; cook 2 minutes or until thick, stirring constantly. Place eggs in a large bowl. Gradually add hot milk mixture to eggs, stirring constantly with a whisk. Combine the milk mixture, eggplant mixture, parsley, lemon juice, tahini, salt, and pepper in a blender or food processor; process until smooth. Return mixture to bowl.

Beat the egg whites and cream of tartar at high speed of a mixer until stiff peaks form. Gently stir one-fourth of the egg white mixture into the eggplant mixture. Gently fold in the remaining egg white mixture. Pour mixture into prepared souffle dish and sprinkle sesame seeds evenly over the souffle. Bake at 205° for 10 minutes.

Reduce oven temperature to 190° (do not remove the souffle from the oven) and bake for an additional 40 minutes or until puffy and golden. Carefully remove foil collar and serve immediately. (Serves 6.)

Israeli ice cream companies like Dr. Lek and Glida Beersheba that produce quality homemade-style ice creams in flavors that are mostly natural. Feldman is a different kind of Israeli ice cream company because it competes in the ice-cream-bar market against both larger local and foreign brands. But, unfortunately, Feldman goes for the cheap, not the quality, line and its flavors taste artificial.

Its new donut-shaped ice-cream bar is typical of its other products. It's vanilla-flavored, cream-based ice cream covered in bubblegum-flavored chocolate coating and decorated with colorful candies. Need I say more? NIS 4 per bar.

Natural nectar (OK)

With so much junk around to drink, it's nice to see that a major company is "going natural." Spring, a popular Israeli beverage line, has just come out with a new bottle and a new line of drinks made with all natural ingredients. Flavors: strawberry-banana; mango; orange; apple; peach; pear; and guava. The strawberry-banana is OK; the apple still tastes synthetic. I prefer real juice to nectar. A 400 ml. container costs NIS 6.65.

A winner

Fans of Yarden wines will be pleased to know that the winery was just awarded a gold medal at the International Wine and Spirit Competition in London, one of the most important wine competitions in the world. Yarden's Cabernet Sauvignon 1994 won the only gold medal awarded to an Israeli winery.

Since 1987, when the winery first entered the competition, it has been awarded 16 consecutive gold medals.

Food entertainment
Homemade is the theme of the food fair that takes place every Thursday from 6-10:30 p.m. and every Friday from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. during the summer months at Dizengoff Center in Tel Aviv. There are around 50 stands offering items like homemade Moroccan, Thai, Tunisian, Iraqi, and Kurdish food, as well as containers of preserves, cheeses, spices, pickles and beer. Since almost 20,000 people visit the fair every week, it's a good idea to get there early so you can find parking in the underground lot.

Birthday tip

It's nice to find a place to eat that's child-friendly these days. Kudos go to Columbus in Herzliya's office park area for its attention to details. The restaurant not only offers a children's menu, but also greets kids with a coloring-and-activity book and crayons. And if your little one is having a birthday, all the waiters in the restaurant will sing to him to wish him a joyous happy birthday and give him a balloon to take home.

While not inexpensive, the food is fresh and good, the service is friendly, and the restrooms are clean as a whistle. The best time to go is early (from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. they offer a 20 percent discount on the menu and if you order one beverage you'll get a second free). Make sure to make reservations in advance and ask for the non-smoking section. Evenings and weekends are very crowded and noisy.

I know The Jerusalem Post has gone American, but can you please clarify: Does all-purpose flour mean self-rising flour or plain flour, as we British refer to it? I assume that for cakes it would be self-rising flour.

— Candace Niles, Jerusalem

Self-rising flour is regular white flour to which baking powder and/or baking soda have been added so the consumer doesn't have to add a leavening agent to it. In America, cake recipes specifically state whether to use either all-purpose flour or cake flour, neither of which contains leavening agents, which are added to the batter separately.

All-purpose flour is a heavier type of flour that may contain a mixture of wheats. Cake flour is more finely ground and usually is made from a soft type of wheat.

Would you please give a basic cake recipe using oil instead of margarine? I would be obliged if you would give the ingredients in pounds and ounces or grams, except the oil, of course, as I find it difficult to cook when the ingredients are given in cups. It never seems to come out quite right.

— Deana Whine, Kfar Sava

My first suggestion to you is to try your own favorite cake recipe substituting oil for butter or margarine: 1 cup of butter or margarine (roughly 200 gr.) equals 1 cup of oil; 100 gr. butter or margarine equals 1/2 cup oil, etc. This substitution works well for many recipes.

Another suggestion is to buy standardized measuring cups; perhaps one of the difficulties you are having is that you are using a teaspoon that is not the same size as a standard cup. (In a pinch you can use an empty cottage cheese container for a one-cup measure.)

When measuring flour, try spooning the flour into the cup rather than packing it — that's the way it is usually done when the recipe is tested. Also flour here in Israel is different from flour abroad — it is a much lighter cake-type flour made from soft winter wheat. That means that when you use a recipe from abroad, you might want to add a little more flour than the recipe suggests, especially if it calls for "all-purpose flour." You also might want to try experimenting with different types of flour, such as bread, all-purpose and pastry flours, which are made by Siftel and available in supermarkets.

Advice on buying wine

By NOAH TANNENBAUM

It has become a cliché to say that the variety and sheer amount of wines available in Israel has grown tremendously in the past few years, and yet, the statement remains true.

The diversity of wines and their prices of origin is by now approaching the dizzying many, fast-charts try to sell us on what are basically mediocre wines by inferring us disbelievably that there is "a great X wine" — the X can be Italian, Chilean, Australian, Californian or French, like your pick. Most of us, not being international experts in wine, yet eager to try new, high-quality imports, don't know whether to believe and risk the money or adopt a skeptical view and stick to what we already know. Given that some of the imported wines are wonderful and some are average, this is a real dilemma.

Much the same can be said for Israeli wines. Local wineries now are eagerly modifying their bottles and their labels in an attempt to sell their products as excellent wines by international standards. Some of them are, others aren't. But spending a fortune on a wine that is not a sure thing is, in general, unadvised.

And, with that caveat, here are a few capsule reviews of Israeli wines available now.

Carmel Mizrahi Private Collection Emerald Riesling 1997: This wine has a floral bouquet that reminds me of the Far Eastern aromas of rose water and orchid blossoms. It has an intensity reminiscent of muscat rather than emerald-ripping. With a pale color and a penetrating sweetness, it may be recommended as an aperitif wine.

Carmel Mizrahi Private Collection Chardonnay 1997: This wine, which has an attractive, purplish color, has a one-dimensional flavor which is very once and then disappears.

Carmel Mizrahi Private Collection Cabernet Sauvignon 1995: With a pleasant, deep red color, but with remarkably little aroma, this is not one of the best cabernets produced in Israel today. It has a flat flavor which dissipates quickly.

Domingo Rey Merlot 1997: (Imported from Chile by Barkan) This is a difficult wine to classify because, for reasons unbeknownst to me, almost none of the characteristics of other merlots with an attractive ruby red color but surprisingly little aroma or flavor. It is not unpleasant, and it makes a good picnic wine.

Ben Ami 1995: This is a dry red wine produced from a combination of cabernet sauvignon, merlot and carignan grapes. It is an acceptable wine though it is somewhat coarse, with low acidity and a flat flavor which, while not unpleasant, disappears almost as soon as you swallow it. Domingo Rey, I recommend it for picnics.

Companies' activity unchanged in 2nd qtr.

The economic activity of local companies remained almost unchanged in the second quarter, the Bank of Israel announced yesterday.

Industrial, commerce, transportation and communication companies reported that activity remained stable, while building companies and hotels said activity fell. In addition, most firms don't forecast an increase in activity in the third quarter, indicating that the economic slowdown is expected to continue.

However, the Purchasing Managers' Index for June indicated that the economy may be on its way to recovery. Although the Association of Purchasing Managers and Dun and Bradstreet said the index remained unchanged, most of its components rose. D&B said that if these increases continue next month it might indicate that the economy is finally recovering.

The most encouraging rise was in exports, which increased for the first time after two consecutive months of declines, with the majority of purchasing managers reporting that demand rose.

Israil opens line to Kiryat Shmona

Israil, which has been competing with Arkia for the past year in providing air passenger service to Eilat, began flying to Kiryat Shmona yesterday.

The company said it plans to compete with Arkia on its fares, charging NIS 72 each way for residents of the North, compared to the NIS 97 charged by Arkia, and NIS 140 for other passengers. In comparison with Arkia's fare of NIS 160, Israil also said it plans to serve a light breakfast on morning flights.

Knesset Economics panel advances housing bill

The Knesset Economics Committee yesterday passed a key clause in the public housing bill submitted by MKs Ran Cohen (Meretz) and Shevah Weiss (Labor) when MK Yitzhak Vaknin (Shas) sided with the opposition.

Vaknin said after the meeting that Shas would support the bill in final reading in the plenum, despite the cabinet decision on Sunday to sell off the public housing stock at discount prices.

The Likud MKs, led by coalition chairman Meir Sheetrit, stalked out of the committee before the vote.

Sheetrit had proposed that instead of continuing to vote on the clauses of the Cohen-Weiss proposal, a committee - including Cohen, Weiss, committee chairman Avi Yehzekel, the committee's legal adviser and himself - meet to draft the wording of the bill and the reservations to it. But the opposition members said Sheetrit was just trying to buy time and had refused to promise to bring the bill before the plenum.

Treasury considers tax on 2nd luxury properties

The Finance Ministry is considering imposing a tax on luxury second apartments as a way of funding the planned reduction in property tax (mas rechush). Treasury officials told MKs yesterday. The Knesset Finance Committee yesterday discussed the Treasury's proposal to reduce the tax from 2.5 percent to 1.2%.

Committee chairman Avraham Ravitz (United Torah Judaism) said the Treasury should cut the tax to 1% and move towards its abolition over the next four years.

Cemex considers investing here

Cemex SA, the international cement concern based in Mexico, is considering investing here, according to its CEO Lorenzo Zambrano Trevino, who is visiting here this week. Zambrano met on Tuesday with Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky, representatives from Koor Industries, the Rocanani family (which controls Clal Israel), and Nesher, which holds a monopoly in local cement production.

Cemex, with annual sales of $3.8 billion, is one of the world's three largest producers of cement and the largest producer of white cement. It has 38 factories in eight countries.

In the past few years, Cemex has expanded its activities in the Middle East and has dealings here, in Egypt, Kuwait and Greece. Zambrano said Israel is a potential bridge for countries in the Middle East and Europe, due to its free trade agreement with the EU.

Sharansky noted that Israel and Mexico are negotiating a free trade agreement, which would boost cooperation between companies in both countries.

Clal to conduct 20% of activity abroad

By DAN GERSTENFELD

Clal Israel yesterday announced a new strategic plan which will include conducting 20 percent of its activities abroad. In addition, Israel's second-largest conglomerate has decided to invest $1 billion to develop its business over the next five years.

The decision to start operating abroad marks a change in the policy of the conservative holding company, which in the past preferred to focus on maintaining its position as a leading player in the local market.

The new strategy is a direct outcome of changes in Clal's management, such as the appointment of Bezeq Israel Telecom's former president, Yitzhak Kaul, as Clal's CEO in November 1997.

"The move marks a real revolution," Kaul said. "In the age of globalization, we need to expand our activity abroad. Large international groups are already active here and it's hard to expand our activity in the local market."

"We want to acquire companies abroad which deal in areas close to our core business in which we have a relative advantage," Kaul said. "We are interested in buying a controlling share in such companies."

He added that Clal will focus its efforts on investments in Europe and the Middle East.

Analysts said that the move was necessary as Clal hasn't made any significant investments in the local market in the last several years.

"The change was inevitable," said Avital Bar-Dayana, an analyst at Solid Capital Markets. "The activity of the concern in Israel is quite limited and it needed to expand its activities outside. Clal, as the weakest arm of the IDB group, didn't offer its shareholders any added value."

She added, however, that despite the promising change it is yet to be seen how will the company act.

"The bombastic announcement is positive, but Clal hasn't mentioned anything specific. We also need to remember that Clal's management does not have any relative advantage outside Israel," she said.

The company said that it also has decided to set up two new groups for investments in the environment and data communications fields.

The company's board of directors also approved increasing its leverage ratio to 35% of its assets from the current 21% to 25%. By doing so,

Yitzhak Kaul

Clal follows other leading Israeli companies which chose to increase their return on equity by raising their leverage ratio.

Clal also has stated that it will change its dividend policy and will start to distribute an annual dividend of at least 25% of its net income and no less than 50% of the dividend given by its subsidiaries.

Analysts also said that the change in Clal's attitude also reflects the fact that the company's management is well aware of investors' feeling the Clal is lagging behind Koor Industries, Israel's largest holding company, which has been changing since the Claridge Israel group took control of it last year.

June CPI up 0.4%; first half up 2.2%

By DAVID HARRIS

The consumer price index (CPI) rose a higher-than-expected 0.4 percent in June to 156.5, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced yesterday.

The rise in the CPI totaled 2.2% in the first half of the year, and bureau economists said they expect inflation to end the year at 4% or slightly higher.

While analysts had predicted a June index around 0% or even below, price rises for clothing, footwear, transport and commu-cations pushed the index above 0% for the third consecutive month.

During the second quarter of the year the index rose 2.2%, after prices remained stable during the first three months.

The housing index rose 2.2% during the first six months, most of which was due to an appreciation of the dollar against the shekel.

Clothing and footwear prices rose 4.7% last month. The clothing index increased 5.3%, while that for footwear rose 2.4%.

The transport and communications index rose 0.8%, the main rises being in the costs of overseas trips (3.5%), removal services (2.8%) and telephone calls (2%).

Housing prices went up 0.5%, while goods for the upkeep of apartments increased 0.4%. Paints rose 2.5% and washing powder 1.2%.

These were offset to some extent by cheaper prices for household heating (-4.8%).

The index that measures the prices of furniture and equipment for apartments rose 0.2%, and the cost of health services increased 0.6%, primarily due to a 4.4% jump in charges for private surgery.

Good news for consumers was to be found in the green grocers, where the fruit and vegetables index dropped 6%, with eggplants down 36.8% and green beans 21.1%.

The Manufacturers Association once again used the publication of the CPI as an opportunity to call on the Bank of Israel to reduce its key lending rate in order to return the economy to a path of growth rather than recession.

At the time, aviation sources here had expressed fear that El Al's decision would mean it would be more difficult for the company to negotiate the best possible terms in any future purchase. The acquisition concluded in December was estimated at about $200m.

The decision followed feverish attempts by both companies to gain the contract, including sending models of the planes to Israel for test flights. El Al offered its frequent flyer passengers the chance to try out the passenger facilities in both aircraft.

Trade with Egypt slides; soars with Jordan

By NINA GILBERT

Exports to Egypt fell 14 percent and imports by 32% in the first half of the year, while sales to Jordan more than doubled, according to trade figures released by the Central Bureau of Statistics this week.

In the first six months of the year, exports to Egypt totaled $24.5 million, compared with $28.5m in the same period last year. The decline follows a 5% drop in exports for 1997, after years of continuous expansion.

Imports, up in 1997, dropped to $8.2m in the first half of the year, from $12.2m, a year earlier.

Exports to Jordan soared in the first half of the year to $13.4m, compared with $6.8m last year. Imports rose 14%, to $7.1m, from $6.2m.

Gabry Bar, head of the Industry and Trade Ministry's Middle East trade department, attributed the decline in trade with Egypt to a lack of contact between the Israeli and Egyptian business communities and the diplomatic environment.

"The political situation creates fears among businesspeople who might otherwise be interested in advancing dealings," he said. "There is a standstill in economic relations, which have not even partially reached their potential, and advancement in the peace process would serve as a signal for advancing economic ties."

Bar said there has also been a significant drop in trips by businessmen from both sides since the arrest of Israeli textile worker Azzam Azzam in late 1996.

Egyptian commercial counselor Magdi Farahat said trade has been fairly stable over the past three years. His figures show it hovering around $80 million annually, after years of expansion.

"Obviously, Israeli-Egyptian trade has stopped growing because of the political situation," he said. "There is no longer the wish to push it forward."

At the same time, he said Israel and Egypt "have not even realized 50 percent of their trade potential," he added.

"Egypt has no problem with buying Israeli products, which are of high quality and can be cheaper compared with products from other countries due to lower transportation costs," he said.

Israel Export Institute Director-General Amir Hayek said he did not believe that those people who are doing good business with Egypt would stop their activities due to the stalemate in the peace process. However, he said, the political situation hampers the establishment of new business ties.

"The best way to develop economic ties with Egypt is through joint ventures. The buying power of Israel's neighbors is low compared with its main export markets of US and Europe," he noted, saying the sides should establish equal partnerships for exports to third countries.

Hayek said trade ties with Jordan have developed at a rapid pace due to its geographic proximity, compared to Egypt. Bar attributed the boost in trade with Jordan to trade agreements signed earlier this year, including the establishment of a Qualified Industrial Zone agreement for Irbid, and the increased flow in businessmen from both sides.

On Sunday, Hayek led a delegation of 160 Israeli businessmen who visited Gaza to meet with Palestinian counterparts and hear about opportunities for establishing businesses in the Karni Industrial Park, on the Gaza Strip's border with Israel.

No Israeli company has yet signed a deal to set up a joint venture in the park, although many have expressed interest.

Tunisian gov't buys Israeli computerization system

By NINA GILBERT

The Tunisian government has purchased a system made by a high-tech company based in Bnei Brak for use in its national health insurance institute, the company said yesterday.

Typewriter is to provide the system through a Tunisian distribution company which supplies products to its government.

"The system is one of our scanning products which allows the entry of numerical data into computer systems," CEO Meir Plevinski said.

He said the company made contact with the Tunisians, who were looking for such a solution, at an exhibition in London. "We are now working directly with them through our offices here," he said.

He said the system, which costs $1,200 per unit, would be installed in stages. It will enable the national insurance institute to process forms through a scanner linked to a computer database, instead of entering in the information manually.

"This is our first direct sale to an Arab country," he said, noting that the system could have been obtained by others countries through a third party.

Israel and Tunisia don't have full diplomatic ties but maintain mutual interest offices.

The systems are being used by the Israeli government, in the Education, Health and Defense ministries, Plevinski said.

Typewriter, whose flagship product is AccuForm, is jointly owned by Plevinski and ITTI Ltd., a company owned by a group of American investors.

Survey: Single European currency may crash before 2004

By JULIE CRUST

The single European currency, the euro, might not last five years after its Jan. 1, 1999 introduction, according to a survey of money managers controlling more than $1.8 trillion, or 40 percent of assets under management in the U.K., the Wall Street Journal Europe reported.

Nearly every respondent in the survey by consulting firm Mitchell Madison Group said the euro could collapse within five years, though 62% said there was a less than 25% chance compared to 4%, who said the odds for a collapse were greater than 75%.

Mitchell Madison partner Sandy McGuffog said that in view of the survey's findings it was "extremely worrying" that of those surveyed "less than 50% have a risk-management plan in place to deal with the situation, and a vast majority do not intend to have a plan in the near future," the paper reported. A majority of Swiss voters is skeptical about the introduction of the euro and only one in every five voters viewed its introduction positively, Volkswirtschaft magazine said on July 8, citing an opinion poll by GFS Research Institute. (Bloomberg)

US stocks ended on a mixed note yesterday as investors cashed in profits from the rally in blue chips, but the technology-laced Nasdaq market roared ahead to its sixth record close in a row. Based on early, unofficial data, the Dow Jones industrial average ended down 11.07 points, or 0.12

In the broad market, declining issues led advances by a thin margin on heavy volume of 727 million shares on the New York Stock exchange.

The Nasdaq composite index gained 26.13 points, or 1.3%, to 994.54.

The blue-chip Dow ended lower despite a surge in component Eastman Kodak Co. after the film and imaging product company posted surprisingly strong second-quarter earnings. Kodak was up 9-1/8 at 82-7/8.

Caterpillar Inc., another Dow component, tumbled 4-1/4 to 52

Big-name technology stocks continued to lead Nasdaq to new records.

Intel Corp. gained 3-9/16 to 84-1/4 as investors were calmed by its earnings announcement late Tuesday and the company's comments on its outlook.

In individual issues, WorldCom Inc. rose 2 to 54-3/4 and MCI Telecommunications Corp. gained 2-1/16 to 67 after the US Justice department gave its conditional approval to the merger of the two companies. (Reuters)

Winds likely to pose problems at British Open

SOUTHPORT (AP) — When Royal Birkdale last played host to the British Open, Ian Baker-Finch was at the top of his game and par was a high score on a calm weekend that featured the course at its most benign.

Leap ahead seven years and a lot has changed on the rolling hills and sand dunes hugging the coast of the Irish Sea. And not all of it involves Baker-Finch, whose game went into such a funk after he won here in 1991 that he will spend this British Open in a broadcasting booth.

The greens are new, the rough a little deeper and the fairways a bit narrower. But it is the wind that has howled here all week that has players shaking their heads in disbelief and talking about US Open-type scores in the third major of the year.

"If it stays like this, 290 (10-over-par) would be real good," US Open runner-up Payne Stewart said. "When you come over here you expect this kind of weather, but for the last few years we have had very nice weather."

Not so far this year, as the weather has been so bad in practice rounds that players were running out of balls after the wind carried shot after shot into the knee-deep meadow rye grass that sways in the breeze between fairways.

Tom Lehman lost six balls on the ninth hole alone, and US Open champion Lee Janzen didn't even begin to look for some of his wayward shots.

Just when the world's best players were getting over conditions at the Olympic Club, where Janzen shot even par to win, Royal Birkdale served notice that it won't be the pushover it was in 1991 when Baker-Finch shot 64-66 the last two days to win his only major.

The wind didn't blow that year, however, as it has during the blustery practice rounds as players have struggled to remain steady over the ball while being peppered at times by rain.

Conditions were so bad at times that Lehman hit driver-driver and couldn't reach the 421-yard second hole. Some players couldn't hit the ball far enough into the wind to reach the fairway on the 480-yard, par-4 sixth.

When the wind was at its worst Monday, Tiger Woods could hit a 3-iron only 152 yards on the par-3 seventh hole.

Of course, Woods then nearly reached the green with his tee shot on the downwind 457-yard 8th hole after being urged by playing partner Mark O'Meara to hit it over the dogleg to within a few yards of the green.

British oddsmakers have made Woods and Lee Westwood co-favorites to win the Claret Jug when the 127th Open championship begins today.

It is the first time Woods has not been a sole favorite in any tournament he entered since winning the Masters last year.

Westwood is now the hotter golfer after winning for the seventh time on four continents in the last seven months last week at the Loch Lomond in Scotland.

Westwood, the 25-year-old who has inherited the mantle of Britain's best player from Nick Faldo, hits the ball low and straight, an advantage in any windy conditions. He also has a deft touch around the greens.

Last year's winner, Justin Leonard, is among the usual list of contenders, as is Nick Price, Ernie Els and Lehman. Adding a little flavor to the field are a pair of hot amateurs in US Amateur champion Matt Kuchar and 18-year-old Spanish standout Sergio Garcia.

Gary Player, appearing in his 43rd consecutive Open, is in the field of 156, but the biggest news is the absence of Jack Nicklaus, who at the age of 58 is ending his incredible streak of 146 consecutive majors.

Monty happy on the road

Colin Montgomerie is happy not to have play at home — a pressure that destroyed his chances last year.

At Scotland's Royal Troon, Montgomerie soared to a first-round 76, all but ending his chance of victory.

At least he improved enough, with a 69, to make the halfway cut, something he had failed to do in four of the previous five British Opens. He finished joint 24th.

"It is human nature to feel a little more pressure at your own course," the World No. 5 said yesterday.

in brief

Joseph signs with Maple Leafs

TORONTO (AP) — Curtis Joseph joined the Toronto Maple Leafs yesterday, the third high-priced NHL goalie to sign this week.

Joseph signed a four-year contract, reportedly for $24 million. He appeared headed to the New York Rangers earlier in the week, but turned down a four-year, $22m offer.

New York then turned back to Mike Richter, who re-signed yesterday, a four-year, $21.8m contract. Earlier, John Vanbiesbrouck signed with Philadelphia.

Joseph, 31, was 29-31-9 with a 2.63 goals-against average and eight shutouts last season for Edmonton.

Israeli swimmer shines in Moscow

In just two days, 15-year-old swimmer Adi Bichman moved up on the podium from bronze to silver in the Youth Olympics in Moscow.

Swimming in the 400 meters individual medley yesterday, her favorite event, Bichman captured the silver medal and set a new national time of 4:56.50. The previous record, set in 1993, was 4:58.80.

A day earlier Bichman, a product of Wingate Institute's program for gifted swimmers, picked up a bronze medal while setting the national record twice in the 400m freestyle event.

In the heats, she set a new record of 4:21:40 for the third best result of the morning races. She improved her performance further in the final to 4:21:14, seizing the bronze medal.

Bichman cut 3.97 seconds off the previous record of 4:25:11 by Michael Amin which had stood for nine years.

In other results yesterday, Vered Borochovsky also scored a new national record, finishing fourth in the 100m butterfly in a time of 1:03:00. The earlier record of 1:03:18 had belonged to Timea Toth since 1992.

Boxing fans riot at welterweight fight

READING (AP) — A riot involving rival fans of England's Geoff Mearns and Wales' Michael Smith delayed Tuesday night's British welterweight title fight between the sixth and seventh rounds for more than five minutes.

Mearns won the title by knockout 71 seconds into the seventh round, when chairs were thrown and bare knuckle brawling broke out among an estimated 50 to 60 people. Police made four arrests.

The Reading riot was the worst crowd violence at a British boxing bout since the WBC super-middleweight title fight between Nigel Benn and Juan Carlos Gomez at Birmingham's National Exhibition Center in 1994.

Cubs 7, Pirates 4

Glenallen Hill had three hits and two RBIs, including one of four consecutive run-scoring singles in a six-run sixth inning for visiting Chicago.

Sammy Sosa failed to homer for the fourth consecutive game — he has 35 homers in 93 games — but contributed an RBI single among the Cubs' 11 hits.

Reds 7, Cardinals 4

Eddie Taubensee's three-run homer snapped a tie in the seventh inning as visiting Cincinnati won its ninth straight game.

The streak, which follows an 11-game losing streak, is the Reds' longest since they also won nine straight from May 22-31, 1995.

Cardinals slugger Mark McGwire, who leads the majors with 40 home runs, did not start for the first time since June 4 — when he went out with back spasms. McGwire pinch hit with one out and two out in the ninth, and grounded out to third to end the game.

Phillies 4, Brewers 2
Scott Rolen's two-run double off Jeff Juden in the top of the eighth broke up a scoreless game.

Juden (7-8) surrendered back-to-back singles to Doug Glavine and Gregg Jefferies to start the eighth before Rolen sent a 1-2 slider into the gap in left-center.

Expos 2, Marlins 1
Dustin Hermanson allowed five hits in eight innings and overcame some shaky Montreal defense as the visitors snapped Florida's season-high winning streak at four.

Padres 8, Rockies 7
Wally Joyner homered and drove in four runs as visiting San Diego ended Colorado's season-high four-game winning streak.

Astros 4, Diamondbacks 2
Shaun Reynolds became the NL's fourth 12-game winner, picking up his fifth victory in a row as visiting Houston snapped a four-game losing streak.

Dodgers 2, Giants 1
Robb Nen's wild pitch scored Raul Mondesi with two outs in the bottom of the ninth inning.

Nen's 1-0 pitch to rookie Adrian Beltre with the bases loaded was in the dirt and got by catcher Brian Johnson, allowing Mondesi to score standing up.

CRITICS' CHOICE

CLASSICAL MUSIC

MICHAEL AJZENSTADT

The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra opens its end-of-season Beethoven Festival, under the baton of music director Zubin Mehta, Saturday at 9 p.m. at Tel Aviv's Mann Auditorium, with Jonathan Gilad playing the first piano concerto and Mehta leading his orchestra in the composer's first and fifth symphonies.

Zvi Menikher and David Shemer present a mini-harpichord festival at the Targ Center in Ein Kerem, Jerusalem tomorrow at noon, playing music by Rameau and Couperin and a special two keyboard version of Bach's third Brandenburg concerto.

The Israel Vocal Arts Institute's summer program continues tonight at 7 p.m., when extraordinary bass Paolo Montarsolo presents a master class at the Israel Music Conservatory in Tel Aviv. On Saturday at 9 p.m. at Tel Aviv's Enav Center, the young opera singers who participate in the program present a concert of arias.

DANCE

HELEN KAYE

The Israel Ballet has a new dance, Tangoneon, created for it by Brazilian-born dancer/choreographer Antonio Gomes, presenting life as a tango. This isn't as dait as it sounds, because in its original incarnation tango was the dance of the downtrodden and the working classes. It moved into high society only during the thirties. The multi-talented Gomes also designed the set, the costumes and the lighting. Tonight at the Bat Yam municipal auditorium at 8:30 p.m.

Ohad Naharin has created a dance for children with the Batseva Ensemble called Za'chacha a portmanteau word for "chacha for a'atutim" or little ones. Set to a chacha/rauche/Strauss waltz soundtrack, the dance mixes new and old into fresh patterns. Recommended for kids from seven and up. At the Nahariya Auditorium at 6 p.m.

William Louthier and local dance pioneer and Israel Prize winner Hassia Levy-Agron go back a long way together. Because of their admiration for one another, the eminent African-American choreographer and dancer came here every summer for years to give workshops and master classes at the Rubin Academy and the Jerusalem Dance Theater headed by Tamara Milnick. Louthier died last May and IDT's memorial for him includes a video of him and Galina Panov in Louthier's Obsession (1997), excerpts from his Elijah and Hermit Songs created for Louthier by Alvin Ailey. Tomorrow at noon at Gerard Behar.

'Israel Night' at Shea planned

By MARILYN HENRY

NEW YORK — Israel will be at bat at Shea Stadium on August 4 when the New York Mets hold "Israel 50 Night" at the ball park in Queens, N.Y.

Shmuel Sisso, the consul general in New York, will toss out the first ball at the game between the Mets and the San Francisco Giants.

"He's working on his fast ball and slider," a staffer at the consulate joked yesterday.

The team each year sets aside a week for "international night" for various ethnic communities. This year's Jewish night has become "Israel 50," which is being coordinated with Sisso's office and the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York.

Dudu Fisher will give a pre-game concert in which he will sing Hatikvah and the Star Spangled Banner. Israeli tourism videos will be shown on "Diamondvision," a huge screen on the scoreboard.

'Mr Liverpool' resigns

LIVERPOOL (AP) — Ronnie Moran, who earned the nickname "Mr Liverpool" after nearly 50 years with the Premier League team, announced his retirement yesterday.

Moran joined Liverpool in July 1949 and played 379 games for the club before joining the coaching staff.

Griffey slams pair to reach 39

SEATTLE (AP) — Ken Griffey Jr. hit his AL-leading 38th and 39th homers — his 1,500th and 1,501st career hits — as the Seattle Mariners beat the Texas Rangers 6-3 on Tuesday.

With his first two-homer game since June 2, Griffey moved within one homer of St. Louis' Mark McGwire and four ahead of Sammy Sosa of the Chicago Cubs.

Griffey, homering for the first time in four games, hit a 370-foot homer to right field in the third inning off John Burkett (5-10) to give Seattle a 2-0 lead.

Texas' Juan Gonzalez, who leads the majors with 101 RBIs, did not drive in a run for the sixth straight game.

Athletics 6, Angels 2
Kenny Rogers pitched six scoreless innings before leaving with soreness in his left hamstring as host Oakland beat Anaheim for the fifth straight time.

Rogers (9-3), who allowed four hits and walked three, was visited on the mound during the sixth inning by a trainer and manager Art Howe. He got out of the inning, leaving runners on second and third, but decided not to return.

Devil Rays 5, Red Sox 4
Miguel Cairo's ninth-inning single drove in the winning run as host Tampa Bay ended its 11-game losing streak.

Tigers 8, Royals 3
Justin Thompson finally won a home game and Tony Clark hit a three-run homer.

Luis Gonzalez and Deivi Cruz also homered and Damian Easley added a two-run double for the Tigers.

Yankees 7, Indians 1
Andy Pettitte plunked Yankee-killer Jim Thome on the arm, then breezed through the rest of host Cleveland's lineup for a six-hitter.

With a split in the playoff-like two-game series, the Yankees were able to improve to 66-21 and keep pace with the 1902 Pittsburgh Pirates for the best start this century.

Orioles 11, Blue Jays 5
Chris Hoiles hit a grand slam to cap a six-run first inning that lifted host Baltimore to its sixth straight victory.

Rafael Palmeiro, B.J. Surhoff and Joe Carter added solo homers

FLYBY — Toronto OF Shawn Green watches as Chris Hoiles' 1st-inning grand slam home run disappears into the Camden Yards bleachers. Baltimore won 11-5.

for the Orioles, who completed their most successful homestand in five years.

White Sox 8, Twins 5
Frank Thomas hit a three-run homer with two outs in the bottom of the ninth, capping a four-run ninth inning to lift Chicago.

Thomas' 15th homer, off Rick Aguilera (3-6), came after Chicago's bullpen had allowed the Twins to score two runs in the top of the ninth for a 5-4 lead. Albert Belle homered for the seventh time in six games for the White Sox, who have won four of five.

NATIONAL LEAGUE
Braves 4, Mets 2
John Smoltz revived Atlanta's rotation with eight strong innings, and also hit a go-ahead single as the Braves broke a three-game losing streak with an away victory.

Chipper Jones hit a solo home run and an RBI double — misjudged by new Mets left fielder Todd Hundley — helping Atlanta avoid matching its longest skid of the season.

Israel at highest FIFA ranking

Brazil retain top spot; France jump 15 to No. 2

By CHRIS WALKER, SEAN PALMER and agencies

Israel leaped eight places to 39th, their highest-ever placement in the FIFA world rankings, announced yesterday.

In the previous rankings, two months ago, the national team was ranked 47th. The team's fortunes have steadily improved, from a low ranking of 71 in September, 1993.

Brazil remained on top of the rankings despite its 3-0 loss to France in the World Cup final.

The French, meanwhile, moved up 15 places to No. 2.

FIFA, soccer's world governing body, listed Brazil as the No. 1 team for the 52nd consecutive month with 73.84 points.

The new rankings reflect the results of the World Cup, with France moving from No. 17 to No. 2 with 70.18, Germany dropping one place to No. 3 and Croatia — surprise World Cup semifinalists — jumping from No. 19 to No. 4.

The biggest mover in the top 10 were the Netherlands, who moved 17 places from No. 22 into a tie with Italy at No. 8.

England's loss to Argentina in the second round had a major impact on their world ranking, which dropped from No. 5 to No. 10.

The United States, who finished last among the 32 World Cup teams, dropped eight places to No. 19.

The biggest drop was recorded by Bolivia, who fell 21 places to No. 54.

Second-ever Aussie takes yellow jersey after marathon stage

'He's dead! He's dead!'

CHOLET (Reuters) — Stuart O'Grady became only the second Australian to take the Tour de France leader's yellow jersey yesterday after the marathon 252-kms fourth stage from Plouay to Cholet.

The 24-year-old from Adelaide, who was three seconds behind overnight leader Bo Hamburger of Denmark in the overall standings, won two intermediate sprints in the longest stage in this year's Tour to earn a total bonus of 16 seconds.

Despite being held up by a fall shortly before the final sprint, O'Grady finished on time to take the yellow jersey, 16 years after Phil Anderson, the only other Australian to have led the world's most famous cycling race.

"This is the moment I have dreamt of ever since I started cycling. It is so special," said O'Grady, who won two bronze medals at the Atlanta Olympics and was team pursuit world champion.

"Phil Anderson was the only one so far to hold the yellow jersey. Now there are two Australians," he said. "Phil was a hero of mine, an inspiration to take up cycling."

Dutchman Jeroen Blijlevens won the sprint finish, snatching his fourth stage victory in the Tour. The TVM rider, who held off Italian Nicola Minali and Czech Jan Svoboda, the points standings leader, has now won one stage in every one of the four Tours he has entered.

But the day belonged to O'Grady, a GAN teammate of Britain's Chris Boardman who was forced to abandon in the second stage because of a bad crash.

O'Grady's team director Roger Legay had decided that the team should help him win the bonus sprints of the day and the plan worked perfectly.

The Australian's chances to take over from Hamburger when two Frenchmen, veteran Jacky Durand and Damien Nazon, broke away. The duo led the way for 117 kms before being caught only 20 kms from the finish in Cholet.

A serious crash less than one kilometer from the finish, again involving Italian sprinter Mario Cipollini, might also have ruined the Australian's hopes.

"But I was back in the bunch quickly," said a relieved O'Grady, who holds an eleven-second lead over Hamburger.

FLYING DUTCHMAN — The Netherlands Jeroen Blijlevens looks up after crossing the finishing line to win the fourth stage of the Tour de France yesterday.

"We were very sad for Chris, now we're very happy for Stuart," said Legay, who signed O'Grady for his GAN team at the world championships three years ago.

"He is like a son to me, since he came in France as a 21-year-old, coming from 23,000 kms away," he added.

Thursday's fifth stage leads the riders from Cholet to Chateauroux over 228.5 kms.

Fears for Ronaldo's life follow convulsions

PARIS (Reuters) — Cries of "he's dead, he's dead" filled the Brazil team hotel after Ronaldo was found having a convulsive fit on Sunday, the hotel director said in a radio interview yesterday.

"There was general alarm with yells and shouts which woke up all the players, who were in the middle of their siesta," hotel director Paul Chevalier said.

The 21-year-old striker said later he had feared for his life during the brief fit. Ronaldo reportedly swallowed his tongue during the convulsions.

He was taken to hospital for checks and later joined the Brazil squad at the Stade de France. He was controversially included in the team for the final, after initially being omitted, but failed to produce anything like his normal form.

Normally when the Brazilians left for their matches there was a party atmosphere with singing and music, but the mood before Sunday's final was very different.

"When they left the hotel at six or 6:30 for the Stade de France, there was complete silence on the bus and we who knew them personally understood at that moment that there was no cohesion and they had lost the cup," Chevalier said.

Symcox's 5-wicket haul lifts S Africa

CHESTER-LE-STREET (Reuters) — Veteran off spinner Pat Symcox claimed his first five-wicket haul (for 60) for his country to help South Africa bowl Durham out for 286 and secure a first innings lead of 76 runs on the second day of the three day match at Riverside yesterday.

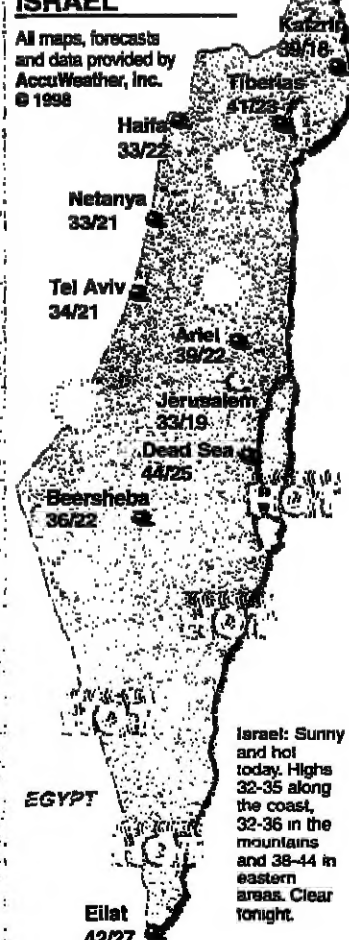

Symcox, 38, claimed four of the last five wickets to fall in an attacking spell of seven overs that saw Durham slump from 230 for five to 286 all out.

The home side bounced back in the final hour with Melvyn Bents grabbing two quick wickets to send the tourists stumbling to 49 for four but, with an overall lead of 125 and six wickets still intact, they remain in control of the match.
